REVIEW OF UNQUALIFIED

- This collection is made up of three seperately published full length novels. Each is a fictional account of life in 1) the gold rush, 2) San Francisco, and 3) Spanish land grant ranchos. My favorite thing about White is his ability to convey the spirit of his settings and put the reader there. He wrote them between 1910 and 1920 and certainly received many firsthand accounts while preparing material. I think one can learn more by experiencing this one book than by taking several college semesters of Californian history. Please disregard the uninspiring title, the drama contained therein is incredible. Comparable to; Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Jack London, Frank Norris.

- I was introduced to Barry Oshry's work when I bought Seeing Systems. I can't recommend Seeing Systems too highly. Reading Leading Systems second was appropriate as it detailed what participants experience in one of Oshry's workshops (a simulation not described in detail in Seeing Systems). Often the book reads like a novel as Oshry describes the behaviors of key players or the behaviors of one of the groups as they struggle with issues in the community setting of the workshop. Oshry shares how he was thinking when he had a chance to be a participant in his own workshop and in settings in which he was personally involved. He believes a leader can do much to influence outcomes and he creatively struggles to find ways to perturb the situation toward a better life for all in the setting. This is best done with a knowledge of systems. Near the end of the book, Oshry shares an experience of being shafted by an organization and his response to it. Most of us, being members of organizations, can relate. I read an excerpt of this incident to a group of downtrodden teachers and I heard a number of them catch their breath at the power of his thoughts and words. His creative, yet peaceful and constructive response was an example of how we can be with each other and, for me, was worth the price of the book. If we can "see" systems, we can understand behaviors of others and ourselves and be influential in the co-creation of something better for all.--Jack Bender, author of Disregarded: Transforming the School and Workplace through Deep Respect and Courage
