REVIEW OF CDGS X3 REVIEWERS GUIDE

- Although by many dismissed as "dated", Pirenne's "M&C;" remains a central piece of historical writing that cannot be ignored. That is why first-rate scholars of today, like Michael McCormick, are still wrestling with the range of issues Pirenne brought into focus. (McCormick's "Origins of the European economy, 300-900" is an indispensable modern masterpiece, by the way). While Pirenne certainly overstated his case in some respects (particularly in minimizing the economic decline of the Mediterranean in the fifth and sixth centuries along with an oversimplified picture of the Carolingian Empire as an essentially non-monetary society), some aspects retain relevance, and also some validity:1. Pirenne emphasized the crucial importance of the north-western Frisian trade in Carolingian times in the "new economy". This point is uncontroversial today; what is probably dated is Pirenne's restriction of monetary Carolingian economy to this region; McCormick, for example, is highly convincing in his arguments that the Carolingian juggernaut fed the Slavic slave export to the Islamic countries (and to a lesser extent, to Byzantium) by way of Venice.2. It is an indubitable fact that the Rhone valley and ports like Marseilles were wholly insignificant in Carolingian times, in complete contrast to their pivotal role in Merovingian times. (McCormick and others don't dispute that).But, this is the only region of Gaul that has a direct Mediterranean connection!!Thus, dynamically speaking, Pirenne is perfectly correct in saying that France's link to the rest of the Old Roman world shifted northwards, namely through the Alpine passes and Germany and so on.The Mediterranean "unity" was indeed a broken thing at the time of Charlemagne, in the sense that it was not transport across the sea that connected Gaul to the rest as it had been up till the..seventh century.And what might the role of the rise of Islam be here?To mention a few points:1. McCormick notes that the large factories for the production of garum around Gibraltar went into a precipitous decline as the result of the Muslim invasions of North Africa (and then Spain). This is an uncontroversial issue.But, how would these products have been spread throughout the (northern) Mediterranean?An ideal stopping place along a coastal-hugging route would, indeed, be Marseilles.It would therefore be highly interesting to study whether Marseilles, in Merovingian times up to the Arab invasions, was a major transit station milking off

Spanish products.If that was the case, then the Muslim expansion cannot get "off the hook" for the decline in the importance of the Rhone area.2. If I remember correctly, a major export article from Merovingian Gaul was timber, along with wine and grain. The timber was sent to wood-poor areas like North Africa and Syria.While the withering of Rome in the fifth and sixth centuries would result in a probable collapse in the wine and grain export from Gaul, the timber export would hardly have been affected (or rather, that is something to find out!).But, the demand after construction materials like timber is highly sensitive to political distress. Furthermore, as the result of the Muslim invasions, it would seem highly imprudent to furnish the new masters in Syria and North Africa with building materials for fleets.Thus, as I see it, the Muslim invasions in the southern Mediterranean may have dealt the deathblow to a flourishing timber trade down the Rhone, and that in this sense, Pirenne was right with regard to the devastating impact of these invasions on Gaulish economy.Anyway, aside from these speculations, Pirenne's book is elegantly written and is a very good read.

- Hiding secret panels is a lot harder than it used to be. For one thing, a gypsum-board wall does not often show many seams, so it's hard to see how that all fits together, for one thing.For another, though, we are nonplused to learn here that there are innovative and unusual locks used to secure this secret panel. A point well made.Lockes are designed to prevent unauthorized entry into places we wish left alone. But think of this, especially as regards non-electronic locks: if your nose went on strike, would you picket?
