REVIEW OF ACCA P3 STUDY TEXT

- This was the first Christian fiction book I ever read. I've now read it several times and recommend it to anyone who likes to read a good book with a good ending.
- As the previous reviewer states, this book makes little attempt at objectivity, since it is written by a South Sudanese (Dinka) living in America. Unlike him/her, however, I feel that as a result of the subjectivity, I am still relatively uneducated about the civil war in Sudan. Concessions to SPLA brutality are fleeting and apologetic, and there is, I believe, no mention at all of the actual war between Khartoum and the SPLA-- a major drawback for me, considering the book's title. The vast majority of the text deals with slavery. Jok attributes quotes to various Northern politicians, then admits in the footnotes that he has "no documentation as to when this statement was made," but rather attributes them to "popular political discourse." The most interesting parts for me were discussions of the roots of the North/South conflict in the Turco-Egyptian, Mahdist and Anglo-Egyptian occupations

(especially the latter), but again these were frustratingly brief. In response to the previous reviewer's confusion, I believe that the contention is that Arabic, Muslim northerners have historically looked down upon African (though they're all African), Christian/animist southerners, the roots of which sentiment seem to be age old. It is understandable, however, that one would be fuzzy on the exact argument. The causes all seem to blend together; indeed, the entire book struck me as being rather poorly organized. Many terms or events were redundantly recounted/defined three or four times in different chapters, the same points are made repeatedly, and the conclusion chapter is really a digression on the redemption program. Lastly, the actual writing could have used a thorough editing. Many sentences came off as rather awkward, and it seemed as though footnotes were often missing where they should have been. I suggest that one seek out a more objective account, at least as an introduction to the Sudanese conflict.
