REVIEW OF ZOOTECNIA GENERAL

• *spoiler alert*The reader who usually dislikes books with clogged arteries from too much description (so, 4 instead of 5 stars), might enjoy reading Rabbit's story, and understand his erratic mindset a bit when Janice turns out to be a vapid drunk and mama's girl..... when all of a sudden the reader might be knee-capped about 50 pages from the end, upon Rabbit leaving Janice for the second time. Updike gets into Janice's head then, and the way he describes the terror and desolation of the mommy abandoned with babies -- very, very real. The anger, the pain and worry for the children, the hemorrhaging of confidence and capabilities, the unanswered questions, the shut door and the silence, all terribly true. But of course most abandoned mommies do not become drunks and everyone survives more or less intact. And years later, when all is more or less forgiven and forgotten, the reader might happen to be in a public place and reading this part of the book and a wound reopens as if new, you might start crying, and it is not a pretty crying, it is the crying of the lost, of the abandoned, of the forgotten, of the rejected. The rage, the hopeless way the reader with bad old memories might appear will cause those nearby to move away, to ask cautiously "are you okay?" and the reader has to marshal the forces of survival back up and say, "yeah, fine". Don't say you haven't been

- It's bad enough that a virtual rape that passed by our screens years ago can still cause trees to be killed for profit, but now Dibbell adds to the fun by telling all readers how to commit "crimes" on-line. As one who has to clean up after his mess, I'm not amused. You do have a tiny life: now get a real life.
