REVIEW OF MOTEL CHRONICLES

- Deep down the story carries an important message about dreams and their fulfillment. The story revolves around George and Lennie, two immigrant workers, who believe that someday they will not be working for someone else, but would have their own ranch. The characters of George and Lennie are strikingly different yet they seem to be complementing each other. While, George is depicted to be an energetic man, Lennie is mentally retarded. George is shown to be very protective of Lennie. Steinbeck, very nicely depicts that the protection accorded to Lennie is not act of altruism, but instead, in a way it is a selfish act, an act that makes George feel that he is important and someone is dependent on him. The other characters also carry their story far beyond what is explicitly written about them. Crook's situation highlight a strange sense of numbness and indifference to emotions and feeling, apparently a consequence of oppression of a black American those days. Candy, the old man represents how a man clings to hope and future in both physical and meta-physical sense of the world. With his dog been shot dead, Candy is shattered only to be rejuvenated by the thought that one day he would be sharing the dream of independence with George and Lennie. Curley's wife, the nemesis of Lennie and the dreams of George and (now) Candy is a woman who carries a strong sense of deprecation. Like George and Lennie, she also had a dream, a dream of becoming an actress, which just passed her by. Her life was an empty hope, which reflects in her acts in the story. Steinbeck's descriptive style is par excellence. The story is simple, yet the description of the characters and the locations make you feel a part of the story.

- This is a masterpiece of short fiction. The author has created a classic story of rural American life and peopled it with some of the most intricate, multi-layered characters in modern fiction. In short, this piece is pure perfection. You will be mesmerized by Steinbeck's simple, straight-forward prose and the emotional tension of George and Lenny's friendship. I first read this novel at the age of nine and it changed my life forever. It was the catalyst for my love of literature and inspired me to become a writer myself. Everyone should read this book!
