REVIEW OF PRENTICE HALL LITERATURE BOOK GRADE 9 ANSWERS TO INTERVIEW

- Diamond's premise here is "societies collapse when they use up their resources beyond sustainability" I have already been to and/or studied to a very limited, amateur extent: China, the Norse colonies, Iceland, and the American Southwest modern and ancient civilizations, so most of Diamond's examples were of regions and/or societies with which I had some familiarity. And reading the book while visiting huge sprawling Phoenix, Arizona, during a gas price increase made me wonder how much we Americans have already moved beyond sustainability of our lifestyle compared the the earth's resources. The groups who seem most unable to deal with possible problems are those who fall into some extreme - either communist USSR and China (socialist Iceland is one of the success stories) - or extreme capitalism (those businesses which grab only the most immediate dollar and walk away from the consequences) - or extreme theocracies. Diamond does postulate and give examples of a moderate middle ground, wherein individuals make choices that are good for themselves as well as for all of society (how John Nash of him!)Diamond combines a great amount of anthropological and archeological research with his own experience and anecdotal evidence. He definitely has an environmentalist background, but does not value "pretty trees" over feeding human beings. He is not an alarmist, but he does project a future wherein we Americans will certainly see enforced lifestyle changes, with greater or lesser severity based on our own willingness to adapt.

- Required reading for every member of Congress and Corporate CEO. You too. Collapse is an extension of Guns, Germs and Steel. There the focus was on what physical, biological and cultural factors promote the buildup of civilizations across the world, and how resource-poor and less organized societies tend to be overwhelmed by contact with groups with more metal, more animals and especially iron, cold iron. Here, Diamond examines the internal workings of societies as they face Collapse-the disintegration of their culture and the way the make their lives. Using examples from Montana to Easter Island, and presented in a personal style, the book walks us through the choices made and being made by societies facing natural and man-made calamities. His analysis of the disappearance of Norge from Greenland is especially telling, being contrasted with the successful outcomes in Iceland. In his point of view, many times societies disappear because they deny the changes taking place and choose not to adapt and replace practices that had been previously successful. Many years ago John Brunner wrote "The Sheep Look Up", a novel about the environmental collapse of the United States. As I recall, the title refers to the slaughtering of sheep. Most sheep respond to the herd instinct and follow their leader from the pen into the chute where one by one their throats are cut by men standing over them. Occasionally, one looks up to see the knife-but his panicked attempts to escape are overcome by the relentless press of the ones behind. Brunner's work was an intuitive, fictional projection from 1970 America to today. Diamond's clinical dissection of past and current responses to societal Collapse seems unfortunately to be turning science fiction into science fact. Baaa! Baaa! Baaa!
