REVIEW OF ANNEXED SHARON DOGAR

- IntroductionI write this as a believing christian giving my honest reaction to reading the text. Having found other religious texts pleasing and sometimes inspirational (Buddhist texts in particular), I was open minded to receive something similar from Islam's religious text. My earnest hope is that Muslims will show similar curiosity and open our Bible as well. Claim to clarity? One of the key claims of Muslims is that the Qur'an is clear. Indeed, this claim for clarity is important because it is one of their basic arguments against Jews and Christians that they cannot agree about the meaning of their texts. A basic function of the Qur'an in Muslim tradition is its clear teaching about Divine matters. Now, does a reading of this book prove or disprove their point? I am afraid a careful reading of the book shows that the claim for clarity is manifestly and blatantly untrue. As scholars of classical Arabic point out, 20% of the book does not at all make sense. Some of this can be put down to the assembling of the suras by the compilers under Uthman, the third caliph, but a good measure of it must go down to the workings of the brain of the messenger himself. A careful reading shows frequent mental shifts taking place within the context of single paragraphs - a kind of mental gymnastics. I am not referring here to the short (so called Mecca suras) which are quite pleasing and poetic but to the so called Medina suras. Another point is that the text is full of places where the translator is really taking the best guess. No one knows what the text means, not even the Hadith compilers (circa 150-200 years post the messenger's death). Grammatical issues Another important claim of Muslims is that this is the most beautiful and unrepeatable texts ever because it proceeds from the mouth of God. And yet, as scholars point out, the book has grammatical errors in it. Recycling of religious material from Jews and Christians. A Jewish or Christian reader of the Qur'an cannot but be struck by the degree of recycling of Jewish material from the Old Testament. Not only that, the same stories re Moses, Noah, Lot, Joseph etc get re-told in different variant forms. Not only that, the stories often rely for meaning and clarity on the assumption that the reader knows more than is the Koran. Indeed, if one does not know more than what is in the Koran, one is left baffled. Why is this so for a text which is claimed to be perfect? The rule of abrogation and the claim that Islam is a religion of peace. The attentive reader of the text will be struck by contradictions (Muslims Scholars vary on the numbers, ranging from 5 - 250 or so contradictions). Leaving aside the allowing and then disallowing alcohol, the famous Medina Sura of the sword (when the messenger was powerful and strong) is often contrasted with the religious tolerance of the Meccan (when the messenger was in a weak position politically) sura. The scholars well aware of these contradictions propose the rule of abrogation usually simplified to the later sura knocks out the earlier one. The problem with the Sura of the Sword is that is the later one and its encouraging the slaughter of the infidel should logically abrogate the tolerant and earlier Meccan one. My reading outside the Qur'an on the opinions of Muslim scholars on this point have not given me a good answer to this. Logically, the claim that Islam is a religion of peace is a claim to be proven. The key underpinning of Islam is one of recapitulation and clarity? The frequent references to the Jewish stories together with the key Jewish prophets, the support for the Torah and for the gospel (noting here that Jesus is really a cardboard cut out figure in the Qur'an) leads one to legitimately to ask the question: what is the purpose of this text? If the purpose is one of recapitulation, it fails. Whilst the Meccan suras are pleasing and rightfully proclaim the grandeur of God, the derivative nature of the rest of the material, the fact that the recycled material is re-told in a manner which is less clear and less satisfying than as told in the Jewish scriptures, the fact that the content of the gospel is completely lost means that the claim that this book is a clear recapitulation of what God had formally revealed before the messenger is utterly preposterous!

- The Koran is a work of complete fiction. These words are the illiterate musings of someone who happened to be on his own (like Moses, Joseph Smith etc) when visited by the Archangel Gabriel (another fictional character where evidence of this being's existence is nil). Misogynistic, homophobic, intolerant of other faiths, totalitarian in thought, this book was created when superstition ruled. The hatred on each page drips with blood. Love, peace and compassion is rarely mentioned. I would suggest reading the skeptic's Koran instead. Thank goodness only a small percentage of Muslims take this book literally.
