REVIEW OF COLON CANCER SPRINGER

- As in other fine, classic books that address the great questions of society, The Giver quickly establishes its necessary mood of impending doom. At bottom line is the question that the great and fatal experiment of Communism asked during the last century, the question asked by the myriad attempts at establishing utopian societies: Can human beings be trained/coerced/tricked/cajoled into behaving themselves? Every generation must face this question and usually discovers the answer only through the agony of trial and error, for the answer it seems, is always, resoundingly, no. Four stars rather than five? As with Nancy Farmer's The House of the Scorpion, I found the book wanted at least some small kind of humor to enliven and soften the heaviness of the plot. There is indeed a place for humor in writing that deals with profound issues as Mark Twain dealt with the questions of racism, freedom, and slavery in Huckleberry

Finn. Therein, I think, lies the difference between great literature and simply very fine literature.

- Now Lois Lowry did a great job in writing this book, but it gets a little confusing sometimes. You kind of have to bear down and really think about what she is saying. Overall it was a really good read with some great twists and turns. Imaginative storyline and a painfully familiar way of life to some people. I'm not really sure I can relate though. I wouldn't recommend this book to anybody under the age of 13 but otherwise anyone would be OK reading it. -Tg
