REVIEW OF MECHANICAL ENGINEERING 3RD ED

- Let me preface this review by saying that I believe Dune is one of the greatest books ever written. And to judge any subsequent work to such a masterpiece is unfair. However, DM is everything that the original is not. And a brief look reveals its many flaws. This book is and I believe was intended to be a bridge novel between the heights set in Dune and the continuation of the story in Children of Dune (which was as far as Herbert originally intended to go. And the book reads just like a bridge, short, boring, and predictable. It's almost as if Herbert wrote this book over the Summer just to make a quick buck. Duller than dishwasher, this book lacks creativity, lacks imagination. There's absolutely no excitement, no suspense. But if you short, morbid, depressing books, then this is the perfect read. Set 12 years after Dune, the jihad unleashed by Muad'Dib has spread off planet and cost billions of lives. Not suprisingly, Muad'Dib now has many enemies. Chief among them are the spacing guild, Princess Irulan, and the Tlexau. And you'd think they would be the first 3 targets of the jihad. It's funny how the jihad has managed to destroy everyone who could possibly oppose them but their actual ememies! Princess Irulan is another matter. She has no right to be in this book. At the end of Dune Paul marries her to justify his ascension to the throne, but he already controls the spice, has defeated the emperor, so why bother with the marriage? He's about to launch his jihad to kill off anyone who would oppose him anyway. And if we buy Herbert's reason for the nuptials, then Irulan would be the empress, holding the cards to make Paul the emperor. But in Dune Messiah, Paul is the emperor and Irulan is the empress wannabe, so the impetus for Irulan's anger shouldn't exist. In Messiah Paul complains he is unable to control his jihad. He's in power, so it's simple, don't tell the fremen these other planets exist. Or have the spacing guild send them to uninhabited worlds. They won't know the difference anyway. So I disagree that this book was the inevitable outcome of what transpired in Dune. And if anything it is what least likely would have happened. In my view, internal problems would have caused Muad'Dib's downfall long before his enemies got to him. (similar to how the Mongol empire created by Genghis Khan quickly fell apart under its own weight). But then again a book about a sagging economy and internal corruption would have been as boring as this book.

- I enjoyed this book more than I thought I would. The premise was very creative. There were some good messages about preparing for the future, and refraining before showing anger.
