REVIEW OF TOMORROW AND TOMORROW AND TOMORROW A NOVEL BY GABRIELLE ZEVIN

- "Prep" is the kind of novel that young women dream about being written. Being a college sophomore myself, I picked this up because I liked the belt on the cover. What I discovered was that Curtis Sittenfield has perfectly captured what it is like to be a teenage girl in high school - or a prestigious, private school of Ault on the East Coast. Lee Fiora is the novel's heroine and there's absolutely nothing special about her. Which is perhaps why I feel she works perfectly as the heroine. Lee is not unusually beautiful, not overly intelligent, and not an all star athlete. She is simply a teenager who is desperately trying to find her place. As cliché is this sounds, it works well in this novel. Sittenfield brings so much to the story, which spans over Lee's four year high school experience at Ault. Family struggles, friendships with girls that are difficult, and, of course, that one guy that she just can't stop thinking about. These storylines are so real. There is nothing magical about them; the popular jock does not suddenly recognize Lee after a makeover, and she doesn't get popular all of the sudden. No, these stories, written with hilarious dialogue and perfect detail, are what most teenage girls go through. Heartbreak, self-consciousness to the point of annoyance, and incredible joys. This may well be my new favorite book. I can't think of one negative thing to say about it except that I, myself, was heartbroken when it ended. I didn't want to stop following Lee's life. This book holds power and I think men, as well as women, will enjoy it. But for any girl who clearly remembers the horrors, embarrassments, heartaches, and happiness of high school, this book will make you smile and, oddly, reflect fondly on your own particular high school experience. A must-read in my opinion.

- The narrator/heroine/protagonist - and I'm stretching it by applying the latter two terms to Lee Fiora - is an overwhelmingly one-note character. Over four years, she manages not to evolve or change in any way, good or bad. Her detached insecurity is annoying rather than endearing. She observes people rather than interacts with them, which is just as well, because the other characters in the book are pretty boring and one-note as well. I can't think of any redeeming qualities for Lee - she lacks ambition, is jealous of her friends, and [spoiler alert!] can't find the courage to initiate a daytime conversation with the young man who climbs into her bed and has sex with her at night. (Don't get excited - you have to wade through the first 3/4 of the book to get to anything that remotely interesting.) Most of the scenes begin with such gripping openings as "The night of the fire drill ... " Save your money and your time.
