GUIDE QUESTIONS

- After more than two decades of leading process improvement and business turnarounds, I finally have read about a proven, practical and powerful MVT approach which I intend to apply immediately . . .

- As the title implies, in this story Dovid finds a wallet. Before long he has big plans about how to spend the $35 inside. His sister, though, reminds him that he must try to find the owner. Things grow very complicated indeed when, in response to his ad, not one but two people call about the wallet, which they both describe precisely, along with all its contents. What should he do? All kids have at some time found something that wasn't theirs. The puzzle therefore easily engrosses them and provides a great platform for Jewish philosophy. Kids learn why they must return things, and what to do when for some reason, that's impossible. (Hint: charity is a big ingredient.) The story includes many Jewish terms, and a poem encouraging kids to follow Jewish laws. But it has much to offer even secular families, or those of other faiths, for it shows the joy in treating people well, and acting morally. My son --- who has found his share of things --- identifies with Dovid and adores this special tale. --- Alyssa A. Lappen
