REVIEW OF DAVE RAMSEY CHAPTER 9 TEST

- The author has produced a creative and provocative textual pastiche that weaves together a constructive interpretation of theology, a critical investigation of history, a dynamic reflection on church growth strategy, and a poignant spiritual autobiography. His pronouncement of a new Reformation will irritate many wallflower evangelicals, but it may also motivate a few to get on their feet and move to the rhythms of a postmodern celebration of Christ's freedom and love.

- In this important book Carl Raschke aims to do the following: 1) demonstrate that many of the authors who have been captured under the broad umbrella of postmodernism have all too often been dismissed unfairly and that the church would do well to give them a fair hearing. The most substantive argument in this regard is probably the debate over the correspondence theory of truth; 2) disabuse the church of the merits of the Enlightenment project and of modernism. One of the most important moves here is Raschke's argument that "The God of the philosophers is logical. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is relational;" And, 3) to call the church to adopt a primarily relational rather than a logical view of faith, which, if I am understanding Raschke correctly, does not mean "anything goes," but that we must develop a greater appreciation for the limits of rationality and the merits of faith. On balance, these strike me as credible and important arguments. One reason I say this is because, by demonstrating how Christianity flourished in the US, not because of its pristine logic, but because of an emphasis on affective conversions, i.e., conversion to a relationship rather than to a set of doctrines, Raschke allows us to provide a more coherent view of the recent history of the church. When we look at some of the more hostile reviews of this book we can get a sense of what Raschke is up against: a group of intelligent, well-meaning people who, nonetheless, seem intent on dismissing anything they perceive as postmodern in a single, potted gesture. The typical move goes something like this: "Postmodernists" like Derrida, Barthes, Lyotard, Kristeva, and ____ (fill in the blank because anyone remotely associated with critical theory will usually do) believe authorial intent is a blind alley and that all we have is the text. So there; "postmodernists" must be wrong, and we do not have to engage anything they say at a serious level. It seems to me the problem with such critiques, apart from being alarmingly misinformed, is that by failing to engage serious arguments at a substantive level they run the risk of making Christians look incurious, provincial, and unnecessarily doctrinaire. The great 20th century rhetorician Kenneth Burke once commented on the striking similarity between Jesus' statements about refraining from judgment and the need for objective distance in academic work. Paul Ricoeur makes a similar point when he stresses that the starting point for any valid critique will nearly always be a disciplined attempt to appraise a text as kerygma (sincere testimony). Put more simply, this means we are obligated to do our best to listen fairly and reflectively before engaging in critique. This does not mean we have to swallow any hoo-ha that comes along. Only that we have an obligation to do our homework and check our own hearts to see how our own sinful impulses and biases may have intervened before we take an ad hominem sledgehammer to the thoughtful work of any scholar, but especially a Christian one. Some will no doubt claim that neither I nor Dr. Raschke have heeded this advice. In my estimation that would be an unfair assessment of Raschke's work, especially when such an argument represents an exclusive line of attack. That being said, at some later date when I have more time, I hope to expand this review since I do have some specific criticisms of his handling of a few specific issues, especially his critique of Francis Schaeffer whose importance, I believe, he underestimates. Beyond that, I will say only this in my own defense. In recent years it has been my privilege to spend many hours struggling through the works of authors like Derrida, Barthes, Nietzsche, and Foucault... and to spend considerable time as well in discussions about many of the ideas Raschke touches upon in this and others of his works (the nature of rationality, the status of the Enlightenment project, the mediation of language, the impact of globalism, etc.). Quite often these discussions have included friends - Christian and otherwise - who have contrary views. I have found that when people play by the rules and give ideas a fair hearing we often discover common ground in unexpected places... even when we continue to disagree strongly. But when a Christian Pharisee steps in and writes off either the postmodern or the rationalist Samaritans as a hopeless lot, discussions fly apart and people begin to nurse corrosive resentments. I have been the Pharisee more times than

I care to admit - once upon a time as a rationalist, and now - on occasion - as someone who has found some Christian solace even in the writings of post-structuralist authors I once condemned. The closest parallel I can think of right now to the sort of appropriation I have in mind here would be Bruce Benson's marvelous book Pious Nietzsche where he uncovers an extraordinary link between Nietzsche and Paul. And before anyone dismisses any such research as a priori heretical, consider that the church has a long history of citing Socrates (a pre-Christian, homosexual philosopher who claimed to receive instruction from a "daemon"-spirit) and Aristotle (another pre-Christian who believed women are biologically inferior.) Finally, if in any of this I sound hypocritical, I must beg early forgiveness while at the same time asking critics to attend faithfully to what authors they deem "postmodern" have to say before tossing them onto the scrap heap and encouraging others to do the same. We do not have to agree with one another, but it seems to me we have an obligation to be fair. If we do not read these authors, our children likely will, and we had best know what we are talking about.
