REVIEW OF AUDIO VIDEO ENGINEERING BY RG GUPTA PDF DOWNLOAD PDF

• The problem with reading a 500+ pp book is that you have to write a review that "gets it all in." But here we go. Jared Diamond's Collapse (2005) is an excellent book and worth reading. That's particularly true because of the subtitle: "How societies choose to fail or survive." Every day on this blog, I talk about economics and politics. I talk about things that we are choosing to do, not the things that Nature does to us, but what we do once Nature has moved. That makes this book particularly relevant. Right, so we get: Wait, I see that the wikipedia article summarizes the book. Great. Go see that for thesis and structure. The main point is that humans -- in terms of population -- have often overwhelmed their environment, until an end of abundance (get it?) leads to collapse. Well, he doesn't say "end of abundance" (in those words), but that's the gist. Diamond makes the point that this need not happen. We can change our habits to head off the collapse. My favorite example of voluntary destruction took place in Greenland, where the Norse settlers (vikings!) kept to their sheep and cows, ignoring the fish and seals that were nearby. They starved (turning to cannibalism in the end) while the Inuit nearby just cruised along. Strange that they preferred to die like Norsemen than live, but that's what some people do, when they stick to old habits, like... * Driving cars everywhere * Water lawns in the desert * Eating meat * Overfishing * Diverting streams You see the point, or was I too subtle? Here's another obvious one. The inhabitants in Chaco Canyon (present day New Mexico) left because of a drought, but they were vulnerable because they pushed the water resources to the limit, to the point where there was no safety margin left. Sound familiar? Some people killed in the Rwandan genocide were killed for land (Hutu-Hutu killings), and that was because the land resources were too meager for the population. Australians over-exploited their land because they paid prices that were proportionate to land of a similar productivity in England. The trouble was that their new land was NOT that productive. Given their purchase prices, they had to work the land hard (high sheep density, etc.), which led to it deteriorating rapidly. They should have paid less -- in proportion to real and sustainable productivity -- and they wouldn't have depleted it. Today, "80 percent of Australian agricultural profits come from 0.8% of Australia's land" (p 413). That number is astonishing. If true (James? James! Tell us!), it implies that 99 percent of Aussie agriculture is losing money. I reckon that if half of that shut down, the other half might make a profit... "Of the 80 claims of 'for every tree felled, two are planted' [by wood companies] 77 were unsubstantiated, 3 could be partially substantiated, and nearly all were withdrawn when challenged" (pp 472-3). That was for wood being marketed in the US. China, Burma, Indonesia, Malaysia? Fuggetaboutit! Australia (in the chapter is called "mining Australia") has a deforestation problem, but they cut trees, grind them into chips and export those to Japan, which has PLENTY of forests. The Japanese process Aussie chips into paper that they sell back to Australia at a 2500% markup. I'd call that neo-colonialism, but I'd be wrong. It's Aussie government policy that allows plantation farming. The best way to get change is to hit the company in their PR. Want to end "Blood diamonds"? Boycott DeBeers, not Sierra Leone. Want to stop deforestation? Boycott Ikea, not Indonesia. DeBeers and Ikea have done a LOT more to protect market share than these corrupt governments (of corrupt people) will ever do. Thank god for market power! We, 7 billion humans, are NOT going to achieve First World living standards. There will NOT be a SUV in every driveway, a flat screen on every wall and a porterhouse steak on every barbie. The earth's resources (and environment!) are not sufficient. Things will cost more (resources) or run out (environment) before we get to that standard. Time to go for smaller is better in developed countries and population control in developing countries. Bottom Line: I give this book FIVE STARS. I recommend that anyone interested in sustainability, environment, resources, food, and/or public policy read it. Everyone else should as well. We need to understand patterns of failure and prevent them from happening to us. We're already in the middle of many failures, but it's never too late to stop failing.

• With "Guns, Germs and Steel" Jared Diamond achieved something that most mainstream academics only fantasize about - a Pulitzer Prize-winning, multi-million dollar profit generating, sophisticated cocktail party conversation piece. Diamond's much anticipated follow-up effort, "Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed," deals with the other end of the power spectrum: once flourishing societies that suffered severe decline and, in some cases, have vanished all together. It is a subject that is arguably more urgent and relevant than understanding why the West came to dominate the globe. Yet, "Collapse" fails to deliver on the same level and scale as "Guns, Germs, and Steel." First, let's quickly consider Diamond's analytical framework. He claims that there are five basic contributing factors to societal collapse throughout history: 1) deforestation; 2) climate change; 3) shifting trade relationships; 4) hostile neighbors; and 5) poor policy choices. Some case studies exhibit just one or two factors, while others include all five. There's nothing too earth-shattering there. This relative lack of sophisticated reasoning, which may be perfectly legitimate (after all, simple answers are often correct), is one reason that "Collapse" seems to lack the gravity of "Guns, Germs and Steel." The most fascinating and educational part of this book for me was to learn about the modern scientific methods and insights that can shed light on distant, vanished civilizations. For instance, palynologists (those who study pollen) can determine with great accuracy the type and density of plant life in any given area based on pollen samples in the soil. Alternatively, the study of packrat middens (essentially fossilized rat feces) in the American Southwest can pinpoint to the year the specific plant life that grew in the immediate vicinity centuries ago. Carbon isotope analysis (the measurement of bone composition) "can calculate the ratio of seafood to land-grown food that the human or animal owner of those bones had consumed over the course of a lifetime" (I wonder what mine is). And, of course, ice core samples in Greenland can provide detailed information on global weather patterns over several millennia. All of this reminded me of a combination of the swashbuckling Indiana Jones with a cerebral CSI side-kick providing essential clues along the journey. Moreover, I found that this scientific evidence added powerful credibility to Diamond's narrative on the collapse of various civilizations separated dramatically by both time and space. All told, these case studies - especially Easter Island, the Maya and the Anasazi - and the supporting scientific evidence were the most satisfying part of the book. Where "Collapse" fell flat for me was on the implications for us today and in the not-too-distant future. Diamond can evidently tell us with astonishing accuracy the population of conifer trees in modern day New Mexico a millennium ago, but he cannot provide much specificity on the state of the regional ecology in the present. For instance, Diamond might comment that "a significant portion of a community's protein is provided by seafood" and that "the marine population is in serious decline." So what does that mean exactly? Does seafood provide 90% of a community's protein or 30%? Both could be deemed "significant." And what does "serious decline" mean? Are we rapidly approaching zero? Diamond doesn't explain; everything is explained in sweeping generalities. I understand that it is probably unrealistic to expect Diamond to have these answers. However, the sudden downshift in specificity and analytical rigor is jarring to the reader and, to a certain extent, undermines the author's attempt to create a sense of dramatic urgency. There is one other point I found curious. Climate change is obviously an issue of enormous consequence and visibility today, and Diamond certainly accentuates its role in threatening modern society with ecological catastrophe. However, he also rather convincingly argues that significant climate change has been a part of human history for at least the past three thousand years. Frankly, I always thought that pre-industrial climate change happened in "geological time" (i.e. over millions of years as in "the earth cooled"), not over the course of centuries or even decades, which is what Diamond claims to be the case in many of his examples, Norse Greenland being the most noteworthy. Overall, this is a fun and generally informative read. But, be warned: if you read and loved "Guns, Germs and Steel" you may be a bit disappointed.
