REVIEW OF AQUARIUM WORLD BY AMANO PDF

- Collapse is too vast to review. The topics covered, the ideas presented and the facts Diamond lays bare are so vast and overwhelming that not only did the book take me a long time to read, it took me completely by surprise. Definitely recommended reading if you're interested in sustainability, anthropology, history or futurism. It's got it all, and it's scientific as hell. His Pulitzer prize winning Guns, Germs and Steel, next.

- Jarred Diamond's name on a book is a certain guarantee of quality work. Guns, Germs and Steel was among the most complete analyses of why history worked out as it did between the "old" world and the "new" that I've ever read. Almost every aspect of their differences was examined, providing an extremely creditable recitation of what happened and why, and even a degree of predictive value. I was so much taken by the book, that when I found Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed, I bought it immediately. I was not disappointed; here again Professor Diamond has looked at critical events in the past and proved them of more than passing importance to modern society. Although a little difficult to get into-mainly because the first chapter has to do with modern and current history in which I am less interested-the book is again a very decisive description of the perils inherent in human use and misunderstanding of the environment. The first chapter makes it evident that through past choices and lifestyle traditions in Montana, modern society there is confronted by environmentally unfortunate outcomes, which have made change and consensus urgent. Both maintenance of a human compatible environment as well as of the beauty of the state itself are at risk because of industries that have historically been welcome in the state and a source of pride. Furthermore, the conservative and independent character of the culture has made governmental involvement with regulation of these industries unwelcome until recently. To clarify issues facing Montana and modern society in general, the author discusses several ancient and recent societies, selecting from throughout the world for his prototypes, and notes the response to environment, to change in that environment, and the resulting success or failure of each instance. He notes in particular the eight to twelve environmental and cultural issues that determine outcomes. Among those included are the character of the soil, the sustainability of its fertility, the climate changes after initial settlement, the rigidity of cultural identification with a select suite of behaviors and beliefs, the number of vested interests in society, the presence, size, and management of forests, the "top-down" versus "bottom-up" management of problems in society, etc. The author notes that no given society is destined to fail but does or does not do so by virtue of the choices it makes. He points out, too, that it is not always obvious to those making decisions at the time that they have set their society on the path to extinction. Even when it is obvious, the problem of short-term gains as opposed to long-term losses is not a new one just involving modern CEOs but has been around for a long time. In looking at the latter, Diamond makes it evident that the degree to which the decision maker is invested in a long-term, environmentally sound outcome often makes the difference between the collapse and sustainability of the society. Especially when such a decision maker is able to achieve a positive personal gain and to avoid the unpleasant consequences of his actions, he is most likely to undertake a course with disastrous results to the environment and to anyone living in it. On the flip side, it is interesting too that where society is itself insulated from the negative economic effects confronting an industry, they often bring about negative decisions and the outcomes they least desire. This is illustrated with the author's discussion of the economic realities of the mining industry in Montana, where costs often exceed profits by an enormous margin if environmental clean up is added to their expenses without being passed on to the consumer. The virtual invisibility of the products of mining, because of the number of middlemen involved and the ubiquity but often hidden nature of resulting manufactured goods, removes the sense of urgency that would make the consumer willing to pay more for what is bought. Unlike, say, gasoline which everyone knows they require to run their cars to get to work every day, the parts of that same car owed to the copper industry are less evident, though no less vital. The actual type-sites are of immense interest. I was amazed at what has been discovered of the early settlement of the Pacific Islands, especially that of Easter Island. Having read Kon Tiki as a girl, I find Easter Island's pre-history quite fascinating and was surprised at how much information has been gleaned from recent archaeological work there. The collapse of Southwest American Indian agricultural societies was not new to me, but was well chosen as an illustration, as was the collapse of the Maya. Discussions of the Japanese, Papuan, Haitian and Dominican management of their respective forests was especially impressive. It made me particularly aware that governments of different types can be particularly effective at environmental management, despite their reputation in other areas of management. Among the more recent events the author discussed, I found the Rwanda debacle the most informative. I was among those who believed the entire thing to have been an "ethnic cleansing" of the worst sort and was truly surprised at the degree to which economics rather than ethnic origin played a part in the disaster. The notion that such an event could be seen by insiders as an unavoidable and acceptable solution to what were basically population and environmental issues is scary! It has direct and vital pertinence to a world that is clearly becoming more and more interconnected economically, growing in overall population, and facing an environment which may become less conducive to life "as usual." A truly impressive and pertinent work.
