REVIEW OF 13 2 GNM NURSING QUESTION PAPER

- For a long time I have been discouraged in my efforts to establish two-way communication with children. I would bring books, toys, and games to social functions and share them with children. Once one activity was over, the children would stare at me, waiting for me to start another activity. Why won't they provide any input of their own? Am I overpowering them without realizing it? This book explained everything: the children think I'm a television!

- I enjoyed this novel. It seems very much a story of ideas rather than a conventional story with a plot. While I'd heard of this book, it was interesting to finally read 47 years after publication. The description of wilderness and hiking was exceptionally well done. I found some of the Buddhist levels confusing because they were unfamiliar to me. But I appreciated the idea of "emptiness." To have a way of observing life and appreciating its beauty as well as its pain creates a context from which experience can be treasured for its cosmic connectedness, even as it zooms by for we humans with a lightning-fast pace. I was unaware that part of the novel was set in North Carolina. It added immediacy for me to the story. I could readily relate to the pine forests of our lovely state and Ray's family's attitudes. The two main characters of Ray & Japhy were interesting foils. Ray's search seemed to bring him satisfaction. Japhy's exit to Japan left the ending chapters on Desolation Mountain with Ray's solitary search more reflections than a traditional conclusion of a plot. The book breezes by with fewer than 200 pages and immerses you totally in a non-materialistic value system which was a refreshing place to visit. Happy trails!
