REVIEW OF LOTTIE AND LISA

- Stanton has put together an excellent study on the nature and history of higher education in classical Islam by drawing together some of the most important literature in modern European scholarship on the subject. He begins the book by succinctly exploring the roots of Islamic perceptions of knowledge: the Prophet Muhammad, he tells us, highly valued learning, while the Koran, in turn, strongly encourages reflection over the grandeur of existence (3). These pivotal foundations lead the early Muslims to hold knowledge in high esteem. Stanton shows that the Muslims advanced significantly in almost every scientific field. Some of the most noted figures, he notes, were polymaths adept in a number of sciences, such as Ibn Sina, Farabi, Omar Khayyam, Biruni, and Nasr al-Din al-Tusi. Their multidisciplinary achievements lay in their unified vision of the cosmos, which saw phenomenal existence as organically interconnected and structured upon a divinely ordained order. The phenomenal universe was, for them, bound by a unity and religiously inspired hierarchy according to which each physical entity not only related to everything else, but was also invested with a spiritual significance/meaning for existing in the first place. This interconnection implied that the various sciences were unified at a deeper level, and that those sciences that dealt with the deeper levels were qualitatively superior. Scientific knowledge, Stanton notes, was not sought to control the universe - as in the case of Western Enlightenment science - but simply to discover the patterns as revelations or signs of a Divinity beyond them. It was this attitude that prevented the Muslims from studying the universe for its own sake or for some form of domination (as Roger Bacon would later advocate). This is one reason why science as we see it today did not arise in the Muslim world despite the phenomenal contributions made by medieval Islamic thinkers. The 11th to the 13th century saw massive translations of Islamic scholarship into European languages. Through this retranslation movement, Europe accessed not only Islamic learning, but also the Greek heritage that had influenced Islamic learning but which had been lost in Europe during the Dark Ages. Jews played a significant role in translating Arabic texts into Latin and other European languages just as the Syriac Christians had helped the Muslims access the writings of the ancient Greeks. Not only was Islamic learning absorbed by Europe, but, as Stanton, notes, so too were the structures of higher Islamic education. Frederick the II, for example, founded the University of Naples in 1224 modelling it on institutions established by royal patronage in Islamic Spain. The method by which issues related to Islamic law (shariah) were studied and disputed also had a significant impact on the way philosophical problems were formally approached in Europe. There are a few minor factual errors in Stanton's work. On p.63 he writes, "the Quran states that for every disease there is a cure." As I recall this is a Prophet saying, not a Koranic verse. He reiterates the same mistake on p.99. On p.64 he says that Yazid was the third Ummayyad caliph. He was actually the second. On p.157 he misdefines kalam as "Islamic speculative philosophy". Kalam is Islamic dogmatic theology. On p.78 and 90 he contends that Islamic philosophy died after Ibn Rushd (13th century). Recent research has discounted this outdated view. Islamic philosophy flourished again in the 16th century in Iran in a form which infused Peripatetic thought with sufism (cf. THE VOYAGE AND THE MESSANGER: IRAN AND PHILOSOPHY by Henry Corbin). On p. 76 he refers to "three intellectual schools: kalam, falsafah, and Asharism". Asharism is one school of kalam, not separate from it. Despite these minor errors, Stanton's work is an exceptional contribution to a field that has not been sufficiently explored. Not only does he succeed in bringing to light the Greek influence on Islamic learning (which is well known), but he explores the rarely acknowledged impact that Islamic learning and institutions of learning had on later medieval Europe. One of his purposes behind writing the book is to expose Europe's debt to classical Islam. He writes, "Histories rarely describe the great centers of learning that arose in Islamic society and the impact of these structures on institutions of higher education as they emerged in Europe [...] Through its scholars, Islamdom manifested its higher cultural achievements, and we are the beneficiaries of their unparalleled intellectual energy" (ix).

- This book is clear and straightforward. There are lots of illustrations around which the text is woven. This is not exactly about my main area of interest (which is depictions of Labours of the Months in wood and stone) but Henisch's comments on manuscript illuminations shed light on my areas too. I liked her utterly unpretentious style - it is a pleasure to read. Perhaps a bit repetitive, and rather too much on gardening(!), but overall a very interesting book on a subject not much seems to have been written about in recent years. (I only know of T.P.Higuera's "Medieval Calendars" 0-297-82370-1.)
