REVIEW OF BLUEGEM MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT

- It is amazing that a 15 year old, now older, wrote such a long compelling story. However, it reads like a teenager wrote it at times and does not stand against the imagination of Harry Potter stories and the genius of "Lord of the Rings". It would have been nice to see some more originality. That said, it is a story worth reading and I definitely am hooked enough to read the Eldest book. I am hoping and optimistic to see improvement by this remarkable young writer.

- I purchased a signed copy of Eragon from the author at the Northwest Bookfest last month in Seattle. I was intrigued by this young man dressed in a Renaissance-era outfit. He was personable and talked me into getting a book. How could I not buy his book? It's not every day you meet an 18 year old who has a book published. I read the first two chapters while eating at the Bookfest. I brought the book home and my children, 8 and 10, wanted to know what the book with the blue eye was. That night I read the first two chapters to them as their bedtime story. They wanted me to keep reading. Instead, I promised to read Eragon to them each night. That was two weeks ago. I have held myself back from jumping ahead to find out what adventure Eragon, Brom, and Saphira have next, so I can read to the children their bedtime story. Soft light shines into their bedroom while Eragon is read. The children never want me to stop reading. From dinnertime to bedtime, they constantly are asking when can we go upstairs to our bedroom to hear the next installment of Eragon. The children are so taken with Eragon and Christopher Paolini, they ask questions about who he is, where he lives, what he eats, what color pen or pencil does he write with, does he use a computer? They never stop. When I read to them at night, Eragon is a novel in technicolor. We all see the story in our mind's eye. I feel like I go about my daily business with an Eragon DVD inserted into my head. I want to know how Eragon finishes, but we are savoring each chapter like fine wine. I love this book!
