REVIEW OF RAWDATUL ADAB ALBALAGH BOOKSTORE

- There is a time when I enjoy facts and details and the concrete narrative. Other times I prefer to slip away in an ethereal haze, to be taken in by a poem, to not have to understand the beginning middle and end. This poet is not afraid. She does not bend to the poetics of fashion. She has a voice and it sings, sometimes such a sad song that it almost hurts to read the poem. The poems in this book are haunting, mysterious, sometimes personal, and sometimes mythical. But they are all fresh and full of the magic that makes you want to read each short poem until somehow you find yourself at the end, sighing, lost, miraculously alive.

- The dialectic of Enlightenment is a history of false appearances. For Adorno & Horkheimer, trying to explain the world in its totality is equal to try to dominate it. Totality becomes totalitarianism. The authors present history as a tool of domination. Myth and reason both hide the deception of trying to make all things equal. By this logic -of identity/identification- everything is not, but must be the same. Knowledge is mythical because it promises a happiness that can never be achieved in knowledge's terms. The central argument of this wonderful book is that myth is already enlightenment because it tries to explain the world and gain utility from it; and enlightenment is already myth for it tries to exclude anything that is different or contradicts Enlightened Reason. As Adorno & Horkheimer put it: "Enlightenment has a mythical horror to myth." Enlightenment obsessively tries to free itself from myth, but in doing so it becomes also mythical. This obsession takes the form of a saturating, technical rationality that ends in the horror of ethnic genocide. This is, as Habermas said, "the black book of Western philosophy."
