REVIEW OF SECRET WAR IN ARABIA SAS OPERATION

- This series is incredible and the first volume starts out as a tour de force. Using a combination of deductive methods (lunar coefficient and lunar eclipse date settling), inductive methods (textual interdependency, cultural nominalism via geographic and linguistic verificationism), and abductive methods (thread by thread weave of chronologies and narratives originally interpreted as unrelated but demonstrated to be interdependent, redundant, misdated, and/or mis-located), Anatoly Fomenko illustrates what every historian should be held accountable for: the minimal baseline of what a reasonable person is to believe about the past given limited evidence, ambiguous and/or dubious sources, ad hoc gloss hyperbole and blind reckoning of second-hand commentators. Further, his approach feigns little and simply invites the reader to calmly and quietly attend to the fact and counterfactual comparisons themselves in order to reconsider what it is that they may have taken for granted when handed history. The first four volumes (currently the only available in the US) are the most penetrating look into history which a thinker/reader of historical texts has attempted. To put it bluntly: this is the best literary investment of your life. The degree of infuriation in the reaction of many who have not taken the time to calmly consider its contents, is only a sign of the pace of the modern day - and has little or naught to do with the actual contents. Fomenko claims to have an angle about how to hold history-making accountable before your own highest private standards for verificationism. He delivers.

- This book is the kicker. All the major topics I encountered on the test were thoroughly covered in this exam book. The CD alone is probably worth the price itself, so you can't go wrong. Subnet masking is quizzed fully, along with those troublesome IPCONFIG problems Microsoft likes to throw at you. BUY IT. READ IT. PASS IT.
