REVIEW OF CIRCUIT ANALYSIS THEORY AND PRACTICE 5TH EDITION

- Patricia Cornwell is one of my most favorite authors, however, this book left me wishing for more from her. It wasn't a bad book, just not up to par for her. I had a hard time staying attentive and some of the things that Scarpetta managed to get herself into were just plain stupid. It was hard for me to believe that she would hop into bed with a complete stranger after getting a very emotional letter from the grave from her beloved Benton. I think that part could have been left out. All in all it was a good book. I still am a big fan of Marino and find Lucy to be her usual self absorbed normal. I am still considering Cornwell my favorite and look forward to her next book. I still vote for Post Mortem as her best work ever.

- An object does not choose to whom it belongs and yet it has a history however long, however short. For in its stillness, stories are stirring. If only a painting could talk, oh, the stories it could tell. So is the case with The Girl in Hyacinth Blue. With the unraveling of each story, Susan Vreeland unveils the depth of an imaginary Vermeer painting while offering me a sense of my own history. Of German-Dutch descent, I felt like I was reading a part of myself. Somewhere along the way I suddenly knew why blue was my favorite color, itself a symbol of calm. Just like the Red Violin, each story stands in its own strength. The sentiment, the sacrifice, the suffering, the savoring. I was at once entranced and then released to another equally moving story. Walking the streets of Amsterdam, sitting in the attic with the pigeons, wanting, as the girl in the painting, so desperately for life to account for something. The stories reveal what it is to love deeply and how to let go when it is time. An appreciation for art and its history has been forever transformed for this reader. As a teacher I would highly recommend this for English teachers of all levels who want to teach the craft of short story writing and to Humanities professors who wish to use literature to breathe life into the history of art and the art of history.
