REVIEW OF LUST FOR LIFE IRVING STONE

- Bradbury has created a shockingly realistic future for us, where the desire to be happy overrules the need to be informed. The most frightening part, perhaps, is that this style of censorship is practiced in high schools across the country. As a high school senior, I have witnessed several instances of attempted "book bannings" from school libraries, mostly led by misinformed parents who could not see through the 4-letter words or "disturbing" situations to the true worth of the novel. Unlike 1984 or Brave New World before him, Bradbury's world is closer to ours, and much more attainable. The theme of Fahrenheit 451 is seeing through the clutter and propaganda to what is truly important. Not necessarily books in particular, but the essence of life which they capture and present in sometimes startling ways. Guy Montag, Clarisse McClellan, Faber, and few others can see that butterfly in a landfill essence of truth, and their contrast against the rest of the world shocks the most disillusioned reader into realizing that, in literature, there is truth. In a world where science and technology are increasingly more important, Fahrenheit 451 is a far-sighted message from the past telling us, indeed, the arts are what puts us above the primates.

- Love stories are about the heat of the moment and there can be 451 degrees of heat between a person and their love for books. In the well-known novel Fahrenheit 451 by Ray Bradbury. The story takes place in the near future at a town where the fire fighters don't put out the fires they start them. The fire fighters have five rules that they need to stick to 1) answer the alarm quickly 2) start the fire swiftly 3) burn every thing 4) report back to fire house immediately 5) stand alert for other alarms. So when the fire fighters hear the siren it means that someone in town has been caught with a book in their house. It is the fire fighters job to race down to the house and light it on fire whether the person living there is in or out of the house. Guy Montag, one of the fire fighters that takes pleasure in burning books is confronted one day by one of his new neighbors Clarisse McClellan a seventeen year old, she meets up with Guy a few times, but in their short time period's together Guy's world is thrown upside down. Clarisse questions him and tackles him about his job. She asks him what's the point and why does he do it. What's so wrong with book? His reply is that books are illegal. After all of the questions Guy became curious and takes books away from the burning pile. Little by little he starts wondering what was wrong with books, so he asked a professor to teach him. Ray Bradbury born in Waukegan, Illinois, on August 22, 1920. Ray wrote Fahrenheit 451 when he was 22 and has won many awards for his writing such as the O. Henry Memorial Award, the Benjamin Franklin Award (1954), and the Aviation-Space Writer's Association Award for Best Space Article in an American Magazine (1967), the World Fantasy Award for Lifetime Achievement, and the Grand Master Award from the Science Fiction Writers of America. His work was also included in the Best American Short Stories collections for 1946, 1948 and 1952. He has won all of these awards because he writes with a breathtaking style. This book has a fabulous plot that makes you think about what might happen in the future years if people keep watching more and more television and reading fewer and fewer books.
