REVIEW OF THE MUSIC OF CHANCE PAUL AUSTER

• The Giver, a book I read over the summer, was based on a young boy named Jonas who worked very hard to accomplish the goals he had ahead of him. One goal he had to achieve was the goal The Giver assigned to him. This goal was called the receiver of memories. At first, Jonas thought he would never be the receiver of memories. After all, it does seem like a hard job. Although he thought that it was hard, he found it easy and exciting.

• The Giver starts off like a X-Files thriller, a strange airplane appears in the sky. Jonas's intensity - palpable - will make your heart throb. Yet, you will soon realize that it is a false alarm and the story settles down - you begin to be drawn into Jonas' world, his life, and his rules. This is supposed to be a futuristic book, but many of the aspects of the story are true today - society and parents are trying to control every aspect of the life of their children, without much input from them. More than that, I think the author showed that even if we try, we will in the end fail. Many parents would deny this claim, but in doing so, they are being disingenuous.
