REVIEW OF ALGORITHMS TO LIVE BY HUFFPOST

- I enjoyed Dune a lot. The imagery is very good, you really feel you are in this strange desert world. The story is very intense, as the central character faces potential death in the safety of his home with trusted people in the very first chapter! Plus the central character gets stronger as the story progresses, feeding the reader's ego and encouraging optimism towards life's difficult situations. This is a great escape novel, as it has successfully enabled me to forget all about work! I had read this book as a college student, and only felt lukewarm, but 20 years later, I love it. This is not a difficult read, and I would not try to read too much into it. I see Dune as mainly an escape novel. The harsh medieval values of loyalty and death are very black and white which successfully removes any moral considerations, as none of these situations can apply to daily life. This helps the Dune fantasy. The strength of Dune is the visualization of the desert world, which seems very real. The weakness is that Dune does not make you think about moral issues in your life (in contrast to classics such as Animal Farm). But since Dune is a fantasy sci-fi novel, so what?

- Dune is a masterpiece to some, but it is pure drivel to others. I began reading it with high hopes. About 10 pages in, I got drowsy and set the book down. I found it extremely hard to pick it up again. In the end I got about 150 pages into it before realizing I should only read ten pages a day (and read another book full time) or just quit it altogether. I have yet to take either initiative (although I have started a different book). I can appreciate Herbert's world building, but the pace is incredibly slow and the writing itself is pretty abysmal. It's just not my cup of tea. Many others seem to enjoy taking their tea with a large dollop of mélange. In my opinion, it's a love-hate affair and I'm one of those indecisive types who are stuck in the middle.
