REVIEW OF CHAD ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA

- The master has done it again. I am really glad that Stephen King has found his roots again. He is always at his best when the setting is the wilderness of Maine and when he describes and follows characters with social, mental or physical defects. We find all of these in this novel. The alcoholic, the mentally retarded victim of stupid bullies, the suicidal intellectual, and the teacher who has had a close encounter with death and who is still suffering psychologically. They are accompanied by an inhuman sociopath who personifies the old American trauma of anonymous administrative powers gone wild, which seek to destroy the liberty and life of the individual. Together with aliens that want to conquer this world after several attempts this mixture of characters guarantees a plot of utmost suspense, unexpected turns and a constant compulsion to read on and on. King is also at his best when he writes about friends, about what ties them together and when they as ordinary and often weak people become heroes. This motif of his has fascinated us in "It" and "The Body" and others. Here we find a new variation of the theme. Although the novel is very long I read it in record time and was disappointed when I came to the end. Not that there would be need for a sequel, but my fascination was still switched on after the last lines. Who cares that there are some minor faults (fault is too strong a word, actually)? King is often a bit too talkative, which makes some passages just a wee lengthy. The solution of the alien plot is a bit too vague and even for the aficionado not exactly plausible. But as I said, who cares? The master has deserved his five stars. Absolutely!

- Joseph Mitchell may be the best writer ever to have worked on the 'New Yorker' staff (the other contenders would include Edmund Wilson and A. J. Liebling). Every story in this long book is worth reading, and re-reading; the later pieces, from 'The Bottom of the Harbour' and especially 'Joe Gould's Secret' are tours-de-force of reporting. Mitchell invests his characters with so much life that they take on almost mythical proportions, without ever sacrificing their humanity. Although Mitchell often chose to write about people on the margins of society -- a homeless beggar like Joe Gould, a bearded lady, the hard-drinking Hugh Flood -- he never did so in a patronising manner. He admires these people not because of their struggles or hard lives, but despite them: he sees them, and makes us see them, as fellow human beings, not social welfare cases. Mitchell freely admits that listening to Joe Gould was a strain, and that Gould could be, like people who own houses and property and know where their next meal is coming from, selfish and mean-spirited; far from making Gould unattractive, this serves to make him come alive - homeless people don't become plaster saints, and it's silly to pretend otherwise. A key component in these stories is Mitchell's own persona, which is much like his prose style: quiet, unassertive, but immensely attractive. It is a great pity that, for whatever reason, Mitchell fell silent for the last thirty years of his life; but any sadness can be assuaged by dipping back into 'Up in the Old Hotel', where Mitchell's brilliant handling of detail and character -- and his shapely way with the structure of a profile, always dovetailing to a perfect close -- can be sampled time and again.
