REVIEW OF BASIC TECHNICAL DRAWING STUDENT WORKBOOK

- Simply, "We" blew me away. Expanding on that, of all the dystopias, I do not think it could be argued that "We" has the finest prose and literary quality. Certainly, I enjoy the others of the great triad, "1984" and "Brave New World" and some of their lesser cousins, but "We," stylistically, trumped them. Throughout the book a key elegant metaphor is the glass, everything in D-503's One State is glass, their homes, their streets, the great dome covering their city, even the fabulous "Integral" is glass. Every citizen sees the actions of every other, but everywhere there seems to be a blindness--especially to the self, D-503 sees. "We" does fascinatingly paint the ultimate threat of Stalinism and the Totalitarian regime that emerged in Russia following their revolution, but it can present itself as the natural progress of our own society, and even, in the latter chapters, brings up the issue of Christian vs. Paganism--with One State believing themselves the heirs of Christianity and their Benefactor as a god-like avatar of divine power. Through this we certainly do have a reflection to our Christian-majority western world. We get an idea that it's not the atheism, as in "1984" or "Brave New World" that can drive these nations. It gives us the image of the real difference Zamyatin may have seen between "good" and "bad" societies--the good ones are built on humans, and humans are still the core focus; in our dystopic ones the state's own survival that is important. Allegories could certainly be drawn between "We" and the history of any nation and the major religious powers of our world. Along with this we are presented with issues that are worth thinking about in our own civilization: One State's belief that it is the eternal government, the final revolution; their (as we might see it) bizarre election system; their definition of happiness; repression of free will and even the restriction of their entire society to but a small block of our whole planet (our own problems of urban concentration). One State stands apart from their own ecosystem in a world of glass and petroleum--a future that surely has even been touted as the dream of modernization at many points. "We" is a chilling look, not only at what the USSR might have become, but what horrific potential lies in our civilization to this day, as well as one of the most emotionally driving and crushing of all the dystopias.

- In a selflessly honest appreciation for bare life, this book opens to a yearning for that which the modern human is in search of; the straining of life against its inevitable end to recapture innocence, grace before the fall, love, or what is even more mysterious, forever lost, and finally unattainable. The anxiety of these stories is deafening as you hope against hope for your own salvation along with the characters' in their quiet desperation for another life, so exigent as to be a matter of life and death; a struggle too unfathomable to dare come into consciousness, though felt every moment throughout the living flesh. You will find yourself in this book.
