REVIEW OF A CLOCKWORK ORANGE TEXT ONLY BY A BURGESS

- When I was a college freshman I wrote a paper critiquing Adrienne Rich's essay "When We Dead Awaken." Rich argued that women writers had it harder than men because there was no tradition of writing done in a genuinely female voice; women who wanted to be heard had to write like men. I argued against that reading, saying that all writers, regardless of sex, had to struggle with how to adapt their voices to the accepted canon. But now, four years later, I'm starting to see Rich's point. I realized while reading Fear of Flying that I haven't read a single book written by a woman in the past hundred years that sounds like something I could have written (in terms of voice -- questions of technique and craft and all that aside.) When I started Fear of Flying I thought that maybe I'd finally found one. I read it because a week or so earlier I'd read Jong's book on Henry Miller, The Devil at Large, and learned that Miller apparently saw Fear of Flying as the female-authored version of Tropic of Cancer. Maybe the reason why I was so frustrated by Fear of Flying is that it came so close to getting it right, to being the sort of book that I've wanted to find: something written by a woman who is as honest and funny and brave as the male writers I admire. But in the final analysis, Fear of Flying wasn't quite it. It was a combination of factors. Fear of Flying felt too self-conscious, just a little too infatuated by its own cleverness. (I suppose feminist critics would tell me that I've been brainwashed by the male literary establishment, that if the same self-conscious "cleverness" came in a novel written by a man I'd find it admirable.) And the symbolism was just a bit too heavy-handed -- the book's protagonist has the last name of Wing, but it's her married name -- "fear of flying," her "wing" borrowed from someone else, from a man... yeah, yeah, we get it. And the dashing yet terminally flawed man who tempts her away from her husband bears the last name of Goodlove. Didn't Dickens beat this whole "foreshadowing via surname" thing to death in the 1800s? But my problems with the book run deeper than that. The whole novel focuses on the protagonist's struggle to overcome her fear of being alone -- but where are the books written about women who AREN'T afraid of being alone? Why is the fear of being alone not even an issue for most male protagonists? A moderately entertaining read though.

- When I finished the first chapter of Garden's Corner, I must admit I was a bit skeptical about where it was going to take me. However once inside Little Speedy Copeland's world I didn't want to put it down. I felt there was such a presence of spirit in this young man as I followed along in his journey. Speedy Copeland is enduring and dynamic. This book is filled with issues most of us may have had to face at some point in our lives. From family and friends to testing our faith. Without a doubt "Garden's Corner" and its characters are filled with the power of living spirit. I sincerely look forward to future works by the author.
