REVIEW OF PAYROLL ACCOUNTING CHAPTER 3 SOLUTIONS

- I always read J.A. Jance's novels, both the J.P. Beaumont series, and the Joanna Brady series, of which "Exit Wounds" is the latest entry. The story and the plot usually make it worthwhile. "Exit Wounds" is interesting for the sake of the illegal immigrant and homeless pet/animal "collector" issues that it deals with. However, I remain amazed that such a popular author has such stilted dialogue. Example: Sheriff Brady is meeting with her right hand man, Chief Deputy Frank Montoya -- "Ernie Carpenter will be at the autopsy later this morning," Frank said. "Jaime Carbajal will start canvassing the neighborhood...<snip>" Now, Joanna and Frank both work daily with these two individuals in a relatively small department. Are we really to believe that Frank is going to use their last names? And that everyone is going to talk in full sentences, with no slang or even colorful metaphor? Emotion in characters is handled just as clumsily: 'Joanna nodded. "This whole thing offends me," she said, her green eyes flashing in sudden outrage.' She nods, and then all of sudden her eyes flash? All she can say is that it "offends" her? I don't think so... a real person, actually offended, would twist a lip in disgust and say "it just grinds my goat" or some other colorful local expression (if they were running for office and trying not to swear, otherwise, they'd just say it {made them mad}). I do think that Sheriff Brady balances her compassion for the homeless pets and for the murdered and exploited humans in the story in a believable and reasonable way... it would be really hard to have to prioritize your outrage over crimes, but Jance's Brady handles it in a way that many "real" people would do well to emulate.

- To me this is where this series really started to go off the rails and divert into self-parody. I read most of these books as a teenager and enjoyed the action scenes and the female slave aspect at the time but now they just seem horrible. Norman never says anything once he can say three or four times; does he think being so repetitious makes the utterances more profound or does he just not have anything else to say and needs to take up space? I do not agree with the sexual philosophy but even if I did once a book is enough starting with this book you seem to get it once a chapter. When the bandit Hassan enters the palace dining room on the back of his kaila and scatters guardsman with one sweep of his mighty sword and grabs the girl with one crack of the whip I just laugh. Books four, five and six are still good reads as far as I am concerned. The yellow pool of Turia is a truly unique adversary I did not figure out immediately and Harold and Kamchak of the Tuchuks are very funny. Book five is good for the action sequences, yes they are a little farfetched, and the plot twist where the hero realizes he is not fooling anyone but that they are fooling him. Book six I just liked the battles at sea, everything else was very pedestrian. Books eight and nine had overtones of Beowulf which I liked also.
