- The concept is startling at least, horrifying more accurately put. No matter what he was under the influence of while writing this book, Aldus Huxley poses a fascinating scenario of a new world with new rules. Find yourself absorbed in this alternate world order and re-examine how things are, how they could be, and perhaps how you think they should be.

- This famous novel appeared in 1931, in the uneasy period between the two World Wars, and has become a Twentieth Century Classic. The story is a fable set far in the future of the dangers of materialism, an uncritical faith in science, and totalitarianism. At its most basic level, "Brave New World" is a satire on the possible course of communism (note the names of some of the main characters: Lenina and Marx) and a defense of classical liberalism. In the early 1930's, in the midst of world-wide Depression, communism had considerable appeal to many writers. The people in Huxley's "Brave New World" are raised in test-tubes rather than "vivaparously" and sorted before birth into various classes of differing capabilities. An overriding feature of the society is sexual promiscuity and the absence of love and close emotional relationships. Feelings of depression, anxiety, or loneliness are handled by a drug, soma. Classical works from mankind's "primitive age" including Shakespeare and the Bible are banned. In their quiet but firm way, the leaders of the society enforce conformity and consumption. The society's heroes are Ford -- whose name is used in many oaths -- and Marx. Huxley describes his society with a great deal of detail which makes his dystopia (a term for a negative utopia) seem convincing. The writing is sharply-drawn and satirical with passages of real eloquence near the end of the book when Huxley discusses his vision, at that time of his career, of human possibility and freedom. The plot of the book centers upon a character called the Savage who is brought to England from a primitive Indian reservation in New Mexico where, somehow, he has read Shakespeare and practiced a combination of ancient Indian ritual and Christianity. He falls in love with a woman named Lenina. One of Lenina's sexual companions is Bernard Marx, who has developed doubts about the totalitarian society in which he finds himself and ultimately is banished. This novel is subject to a multitude of interpretations. Huxley's dystopia differs greatly from the forms of totalitarianism that have plagued the world in the Twentieth Century. In some respects, Huxley's dystopia seems mild compared to them. Furthermore, I don't think it useful to take Huxley as a critique or as a description of, say, current society in the United States or in England. There are many differences between our world and Huxley's dystopia, and it is not clear to me that we are headed in the direction "Brave New World" feared. I think "Brave New World" shows that even with a smiling face and taken at its best, a totalitarian society is a horrible affair in its denial of individuality, love, and spirituality. The dystopia is a paradigm to be avoided more than a prophecy of the way some cultures may be headed or a description and condemnation of a current state of things. I found Huxley's forward to "Brave New World" written twenty years after the book highly enlightening and a perceptive review of the famous work he wrote as a young man. Huxley critiques his novel for presenting an "either-or" situation which did not fully consider options either to the Savage's reservation life, with its attachment to superstition, or to the "Brave New World." In particular, Huxley argues in his forward that a life of religious reflection and contemplation is the best way to avoid the horns of the dilemma set forth in his novel. Huxley came to believe in natural (non-revealed) religion and in the possibility of approaching the transcendent through individual experience. Thus, in his forward, Huxley writes with respect to going around the horns of the dilemma of "Brave New World": "Religion would be the conscious and intelligent pursuit of man's Final End, the unitive knowledge of the immanent Tao or Logos, the transcendent Godhead or Brahman." Huxley also supported economic decentralization and was highly critical of the passions of nationalism. I found it revealing to consider how Huxley's thinking developed over the years from "Brave New World" as suggested in his forward. Huxley went on to explore human consciousness through the use of the drug mescaline -- ironically given his treatment of the drug, soma, in "Brave New World" and wrote about it in his book "The Doors of Perception." But I think Huxley's ultimate thoughts were expressed in his anthology "The Perennial Philosophy" - a collection of mystical writings from many traditions. Huxley saw in the path of contemplation a way open to all people regardless of creed to experience the divine and to come to an understanding of themselves. This was his ultimate path to wisdom and to avoiding the perils set out in the "Brave New World".
