REVIEW OF CHAPTER 4 KINEMATICS OF TRAUMA COURSEWAREOBJECTS

- Marketing is a funny business. What's seen as hype is often an honest attempt to cut through the competitive quagmire and alert a real, breathing, human being about the fact that there is something out there, poised and ready to fulfill him. That book promotion falls back on lines like, "The New Salinger" or "The New Mailer" uncovers a sad fact about publishing: The business of communications rarely communicates effectively itself. If it could, you would hear about Crackpots on late night TV. Every dinner party would be talking about Ruby Reese and her trombone and her brilliantly remembered, perfectly detailed 1950's childhood. Somewhere between fantasy and memoir, these pages are full of the kind of stuff your head holds on to when your brain can't take in a moments more pain. The wrapper from a candy or the smell of caps from a child's gun can take on an importance almost equal to the death of a parent when we are pushed to a limit of emotional overload. It's the way we protect ourselves from feeling too much. All of us have experienced it but no one I've ever read has captured it as deftly or with more lyrical resonance than Sara Pritchard does here in Crackpots. There have been no big newspaper ads for Crackpots. There is no bookstore display with words like 'gripping' or 'riveting' in bold type splashed all over the cardboard. Obviously, the publishing machine has no idea what to do with a talent of this dimension. Pritchard is not the New Salinger or the New Mailer or the New AAMilne. She is not the New Anything. She is very much herself and hooray for that. Crackpots is a work of the most tender and delicate personality. It is a completely unique voice and the voice of a natural storyteller who lets the reader know how the past felt and smelled and tasted. If there are moments when you wonder how much of this tale could have been true, you don't wonder for a minute that whatever the facts, this is certainly how it felt. The New York Times has hailed the arrival of Pritchard on to the national literary scene and we join them in doing so. Now, if only someone would tell the rest of America!

- Thankfully America has an intellectual giant like Mark Crispin Miller to pass judgment on just how vacuously stupid the rest of us were for electing George W. Bush. From his lofty academic perch atop the marble pillars of NYU, Crispin Miller begins the book by promising not just another list of Bushisms, but an objective "ain't it sad" expose of how such a folksy but ignorant individual was elected by a TV addled populace in the first place. Then we are promptly treated to another listing of Bushisms, but this time, footnoted by the all-knowing, all seeing media pundit, Crispin Miller. The book's conclusion: The "say it ain't so" election of George Bush over Al Gore and Ralph Nader (Crispin-Miller's favorite) was due in part to all of those right wing TV news producers. What - the right-wing news media? Is this guy for real? It would seem that according to Herr Professor Dr. Crispin-Miller, Presidents should have a certain "smart guy" seal of approval. Unfortunately, nobody cares enough to follow people like Crispin Miller around with a video camera and a microphone, waiting for them to commit a gaff that once and for all exposes them as morons. Ultimately, that's what digs at people like Crispin Miller most of all - that so many of us anti-intellectual voters are taken in by the superficiality of TV sound bites, and don't listen to those who REALLY know what's what - really smart guys like him who vote for approved really smart guys like Ralph Nader. In short, this book can go on the shelf next to Crispin Miller's other works of leftist intellectual snobbery cloaked as media and political insight. Crispin-Miller's next book is an insightful review of how folksy but undereducated Abraham Lincoln somehow managed to succeed as a President despite having only six weeks of formal schooling, none of which occurred at NYU or Johns Hopkins, and minus the glare of television lights. Thank goodness for the likes of Crispin Miller who are willing to deconstruct our elections and expose us for the TV addicted [fools] we truly are.
