REVIEW OF FOOD LOGOS QUIZ ANSWERS

- I found Jarred Diamond's, "Collapse" disappointing after his impressive, "Guns, Germs, and Steel." I will limit my comments here to Diamond's brief analysis of the collapse of the Maya kingdoms during the Terminal Classic period, which I found overly simplistic, considering the complexity of the issues surrounding this event presented in the wealth of information coming out of field studies throughout the Maya lowlands. In this chapter of "Collapse," Diamond presents an uninformed picture of the nature of the interaction between the Maya and the tropical forest in which they lived and prospered for several thousand years before the collapse. He spends several pages discussing Maya agricultural practices in terms of their limited productivity and comparing these to more successful Aztec and Andean methods, and disparages the Maya diet as having "limited protein" content. Diamond clearly expresses a limited understanding of ancient American agriculture and diet in statements like these, which are simply not true. In numerous books and articles, Mayanists marvel over the brilliance of Maya horticultural and agricultural innovations that turned their tropical forests into productive gardens, which reach far beyond the cultivation of corn. Tree crops alone were amazingly productive for the Maya. Diamond stumbles through explanations of Maya warfare when he points out that the Maya had low-productivity corn that hindered their ability to feed warriors on the march, and no large animals to carry supplies for long military campaigns. Here he misses the point that American cultures may have made war differently than Old World cultures and perhaps got along fine for thousands of years without beasts of burden. But he uses such reasoning to explain why Maya kingdoms were small in size and no great Maya empire ever expanded across the lowlands, as if that consequential to our understanding of the Maya. Finally, the point of the chapter, that the ancient Maya did themselves in by exceeding the carrying capacity of their land in ways that conveniently echo our own destructive environmental practices -- overpopulation, destruction of their forest resource base, and then suffered periods of intense drought, which pushed their complex society over the ecological edge, leading to political collapse and abandonment of much of the lowlands. It is a neat scenario, and has some circumstantial support by climatic data...but still very debatable among researchers, who include scientists from many disciplines. There are many other circumstances that were going on that better explain this collapse, environmental challenges may weigh among them in places. I think Diamond is not in a position to make a contribution to the Maya collapse debate, as expressed in this weak chapter. Unfortunately, for an eminent geographer, Diamond displays an amazing lack of familiarity with the Maya and the other ancient American cultures he examines in this chapter. I think that the jury is still out concerning the cause of the Classic Maya collapse. Unfortunately, explanations like this one do a disservice to the Maya, who perhaps should be marveled at for their ecological successes rather than held up as an example of another civilization that ruined their land, like us.

- the width and depth of Prof. Diamond's knowledge is truly amazing! At the same time, this book is a refreshing digression from the usual (at least in Germany, my home) "tree huggers" attitude of sorting all people into "good" ones (who support their agenda), and "bad" ones (who do not). Instead, he argues, that incentives guide people's behaviour, and if they are set wrong -and this can happen without any bad intentions!- the results may be disastrous. The only problem, I have with this superb book, as compared to, say, Guns, Germs and Steel by the same author is that it is too long winded at times. 100 pages less, and it would have been perfect!
