REVIEW OF GRE BIG PUZZLE

- Cannery Row is just a few blocks long. Within its limits are sardine fisheries which give the Row its name. The story that builds up around this area and the memorable characters who inhabit it is suffused with warmth, understanding, and a great grasp of human values.
- I heard Margulis on the radio. She said that truth is stranger than fiction: the cells of our bodies have multiple bacterial ancestors--we are like mermaids, griffons, phoenixes and other combined beasts once thought real. But there is more: new species evolve by the coming together of separate genomes. I read the bad reviews and had to put my two cents' worth in: this is a great book by a great scientist, and the first to show how species really evolve. There have been several books on symbiosis but none on speciation by symbiosis. Did you know that there are beetles that cannot fly without their inherited bacteria? That butterflies probably are a combination of more than one species? That there is mounting evidence that new species in birds and mammals come from the chromosome-splitting activity of trapped but still frisky former bacteria? I noticed in Stephen Jay Gould's new book how he describes cancer as a natural state to which stressed cells revert, becoming more like their microbial ancestors. This is a Margulis idea. I did not find the book bitter or disorganized but full of examples. The book doesn't pull punches--but if you're a scientist after the truth, rather than looking to kiss... for grant applications and acceptance, you'll be more interested in the evidence than the latest theory. And the evidence is that species evolve not (as the neodarwinists have long held) by random variation, but by symbiosis, "a genome at a swallow." That may be hard to swallow if you've studied biology in the last twenty years, but apparently it is correct. Truth is stranger than fiction.
