- 1984 is the chilling story of a world in which the actions, thoughts, and even emotions of every person are controlled by the government. It is also the story of one man's fight to maintain his freedom in the face of totalitarianism. Through this book, George Orwell depicts, in horrifying detail, a world that is becoming increasingly similar to our own. The book follows a man named Winston Smith, a resident of Oceania, which is a huge country under the power of Ingsoc (English Socialism), commonly known as

"the Party." In Oceania, the Party has the ability to monitor everyone at every time, so that not even one's own thoughts are private. Winston seems to be the only person alive who (secretly) hates the Party and longs for its demise. He alone believes in truth, in external reality; everyone else is content to let the Party dictate reality. And dictate it does: in order to keep its hold on Oceania's citizens secure, history has to be rewritten, the past continually altered, in order to prove the Party infallible and to erase the memory of the days before Ingsoc took over. Thus, one day Oceania is at war with Eurasia; Oceania has always been at war with Eurasia. In the next moment, Oceania is at war with Eastasia, and suddenly Oceania has always been at war with Eastasia. Whatever the Party calls truth, becomes truth. If the Party says that two and two are five, it becomes fact. What's disturbing about this is the fact that the people of Oceania not only agree with the Party when it alters reality; they believe the party. Through a process called "doublethink," they are able to consciously change or erase their memories, then forget having erased them, then forget the act of forgetting. 1984 exposes the danger of giving up our individuality, the ability to think for ourselves, the abandonment of the belief in truth. The only way the situation presented in the book ever could have happened is if the people of Oceania let it happen. They let themselves be controlled to the point that they no longer realized they were controlled, nor that they had at one time been free. Once they did that, they reached a point of no return. Possibly the most frightening thing about 1984 is that there appears to be no way to escape the Party, no way to overthrow it, no way to be free when "Big Brother is watching you." That is the message of 1984, and that is why the book is so horrific: once people surrendered their minds, they lost them forever. There is no revolution, no awakening, no hope of revival. Through his book, Orwell warns us, the readers, that if we do not fight for the right to think, the right to "say that two plus two make four," we will eventually become the people of Oceania. The world of 1984 is a horrifying, hopeless, utterly dark world, one which we must fight against at all costs. For this reason, I think everybody should read this book. It forces us to see the logical conclusion of the postmodern attitude that "truth is relative." That is perhaps the most dangerous belief in our world today, a point 1984 demonstrates all too clearly. If truth falls, so does our world, our ability to be free human beings. "Two plus two make four," wrote Winston in the book. "If that is granted all else follows." The reverse is also true. If two and two could just as easily make four or three, if truth is left up to the individual to decide, if there is no solid, external foundation on which we can lay the structure of our morals, beliefs, and our society, then it is only a matter of time before we will fall into the hands of Big Brother.

- Did you know that one could be sentenced to up to 5 years of prison for possessing this book in the Soviet Union? The distribution of "1984" was forbidden in Soviet Russia until 1988, until then people had been distributing the book underground, copying it by hand, translating it in secret and getting turned over to the authorities by their friends and neighbors. Because that's what communism does, it brings out the worse in people. I was born and grew up in Communist Russia, and even though I was born too late to see the ugliest side of it I still know my history and am able to draw parallels. I had the strongest feeling of Déjà vu during the 2008 presidential election in the USA, the way people swallowed the "Distribute the wealth" slogan, expecting the government to solve their problems and make everybody "equal"...it made me ill. Can't people ever learn from history?
