REVIEW OF ABADDON EL EXTERMINADOR ERNESTO SABATO

- I always thought "Crimson" was one of the weakest of the McGee books. I am a big fan of John D. MacDonald but few things in this book hang together. The author thought "Indigo" was a failure but "Indigo" was better than this novel. The plot doesn't really ring true and some of the incidents don't either. It's one of the few times in a MacDonald novel that I will read a scene and say, "Wait a minute..." Not every novel is a success but I thought both this book and "Cinnamon Skin", written after "Crimson" were among the weakest of the series. Then MacDonald bounced back with "The Lonely Silver Rain." By all means read the book if you are a McGee fan but know it's not the best.

- This book is a compilation and revision of essays written by Professor Wayne Suttles, one of the best scholars of the culture, social relations, and environments of the native Americans known as the Coast Salish tribes. It is meticulously researched and beautifully written. I note that another reviewer thought that it misrepresents the native cultures of the region, but she is mistaken (and perhaps overly romantic). Testimony to its accuracy is the respect that it, and its author, has within the native American community, as in a testimonial to Dr. Suttles, who died May 2005, in "Indian Country," the on-line source of news for American Indians.
