REVIEW OF A LESS BORING HISTORY OF THE WORLD DAVE REAR EPHONEORE

- This is the story of the everyman. It exemplifies the idea of good and bad living within one person, and the idea that doing the right thing is always a choice, a statement of free will. This idea is not professed by perfect people, as the perfectly evil and the perfectly good in the novel are the exceptions. Those who don't fit in, don't have the ability to understand the choice, perish by their own hands. This books is about the decendents of Cain, you and I. Flawed, but forgivable. After all, God did not kill Cain, but sent him into the world.

- What an absolutely amazing read. In 1909 widowed Elinot Pruitt Stewart took her little daughter west to Wyoming where she filed a land claim and started a ranch. The story is told in a series of letters written home to a woman for whom she worked as a "washer-woman." Her descriptions of the realities of frontier life and the people she encounters are absolutely captivating. In one unforgettable letter she tells of having a "day off" from all her chores so she packs up her daughter and heads off into the mountains, catching fish and shooting squirrels and sage chickens along the way. That night they are surprised by a snowstorm and seek refuge in the cabin of an old mountain man named Zebulon Pike Parker. This is just a great, inspiring, astonishing story!
