REVIEW OF ABTA TEST PAPER

- Jared Diamond has written a wide-ranging and provocative discussion of our impact on our surroundings and the relationship of that impact to human survival. While this is a great read for anyone interested in the environment, it is also a splendid read for anyone who likes history or who loves to travel. In the beginning of his book, Dr. Diamond explores in detail six societies: Easter Island, Pitcairn Island, Henderson Island, the Anasazi, the Classic Lowland Maya, and the Greenland Norse. These societies no longer exist, at least in their most advanced forms. Dr. Diamond explores the fascinating questions regarding the reasons for the demise of these groups. He discusses the environment of each of these societies and the changes that each group made in their own environment. I found his explanations and speculations fascinating. For example, he explains "dendrochronology," the study of tree rings and its useful applications in giving fairly precise estimates of the age of wooden beams in ancient man-made buildings. Later on in the book, he discusses societies that have succeeded to survive in spite of environmental problems. He uses as examples the New Guinea Highlands, Tikopia, and the Tokugawa era in Japan. Just learning about each of these cultures was fascinating and thinking about their strategies for survival was encouraging. Towards the end of the book, he discusses environmental issues of great concern to us now and reflects on decision-making and motives both on corporate and individual levels. I found his examples of modern decision-making in Rwanda especially poignant and informative. On the whole, I thought this book was a remarkable read for anyone with broad interests in history and current human relationships with our planet.

- I love the characters and how complete the story line was. I especially like that this will be part of a series but can also stand alone.
