REVIEW OF NISSAN SENTRA PIERDE FUERZA CAUSAS Y SOLUCIONES OPINAUTOS

- I had a lengthy review of this and Elizabeth Kolbert's "Field Notes from a Catastrophe" published in the Dallas Morning News, and I have put it online at my Science Shelf website. Flannery's book transformed the Australian government's discussion of this issue, though they still have not signed on to the Kyoto accords. I can only hope that it will have a similar effect on the U.S. government, which is currently fiddling while the Arctic ecosystem melts away and coral reefs and coastal communities worldwide are threatened. The book describes the threats but also discusses the technological fixes at our disposal. The following two paragraphs from my review describe what I see as its most significant new idea. Of particular note is his discussion of "Time's Gateways," which mark abrupt, irreversible transitions in global or regional climate. He makes a plausible case that a "magic gate" opened in the western tropical Pacific Ocean in 1976. Before that year, the region's surface temperature frequently dropped below 67 degrees Fahrenheit. Since then, it has rarely been below 77. Another gateway came in 1998, which seems to mark a dramatic change in the El Niño-La Niña cycle. Both of these changes have resulted in dramatic shifts in rainfall patterns, including extended droughts in the African Sahel, Australia, and southeast Asia. Arguably, those events may be no more than transitory fluctuations. But they may instead be harbingers of more serious transitions to come as the world's climate passes through other gateways later in this century. If they are the latter, the contrarian strategy of waiting for more data before acting is risky business indeed.

- Very informative. Valuable knowledge we all need to take a look at.
