REVIEW OF BTEC UNIT 3 ENGINEERING PROJECT

- While I love Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," I wouldn't quite consider this a reproduction of the "original" edition. The editor has highlighted certain passages in green, and added commentary and exercises at the end of each poem. I suspect lots of folks won't mind this. For me it's cause enough to return the book. I pre-ordered this item because I was intent on finding an edition with the 1855 preface, but without some new person's additions to the classic work. I very much would like to read the work as Whitman presented it, without interjections from an editor or some other new person whose voice for me is an interruption. This editor presents this work as a means for writers to find inspiration for their own work, and attempts to guide or at least aid the reader in that project. For someone like me, for whom writing (and reading) is intensely personal, and who prefers to work directly with the text, without intervention, this is just not the right book.

- I must beg to differ with the other reviewers. I found this book to be competently written and full of beautiful images of the landscape of the magnificent American West, but the love story, the social commentary, the cardboard characters, and the rigid, intolerant, and sometimes absurd ideas left me cold. Glenn Kilbourne returns from the First World War in Europe and goes west to recover his health. His old New York City fiancée, Carly Burch, goes to visit him in hopes of luring him back to New York. But Glenn has changed. He's become a man of the west, a farmer and hog raiser, a manual laborer, an outdoorsman, a man among men. Carly tried mightily to prove her worthiness by riding horses and sharing his life, but ultimately returns to New York. Once there, she sees the shallowness of her city life and finally goes west again. Grey's idea of manhood and womanhood are about as stereotyped and male chauvinist as one can get. I can't cite page numbers here because I read the book as a Gutenberg download on a PDA, but I've got the exact quotes. Let's listen to a few of them: Glenn to Carly speaking about Carly's female friends: "...The best of you girls regard marriage as an escape, instead of responsibility. You don't marry to get your shoulders square against the old wheel of American progress -- to help some man make good -- to bring a troop of healthy American kids into the world. You bare your shoulders to the gaze of the multitude and like it best if you are strung with pearls."...Perhaps you didn't realize that the American soldiers who went to France in 1918 were fighting to keep the Germans from violating the women of New York and Wisconsin. Glenn's injured friend Rust from Wisconsin, speaking to Carly:..."You see, we soldiers all had feelings. And in one thing we all felt alike. That was we were going to fight for our home and our women. I should say women first. No matter what we read or heard about standing by our allies, fighting for liberty of civilization, the truth was we all felt the same, even if we never breathed.... Glenn fought for you. I fought for Nell.... We were not going to let the Huns treat you as they treated French and Belgian girls."...Perhaps there are some women in the U.S. who don't feel a need to marry or raise children. Maybe they even like to dance or listen to jazz! And to think that instead of raising good American kids, they're letting foreigners come in and pollute our race. For shame says Zane Grey...."Nothing wrong with jazz -- where the lights go out in the dance hall and the dancers jiggle and toddle and wiggle in a frenzy? Nothing wrong in a country where the greatest college cannot report birth of one child to each graduate in ten years? Nothing wrong with race suicide and the incoming horde of foreigners?"...I know that this was written in an earlier period, but even in the 1920's there were people in the U.S. who struggled for women's rights and who did not see "the incoming horde of foreigners" as bringing about American "race suicide". And while many disagreed about why we should or should not fight in the war, I should think that everybody with any understanding of current events in the 1920's understood that World War I had nothing to do with protecting the women of America from German rapists. Grey was a throwback to a primitive mentality, anti-urban, anti-foreign, anti-female, anti-intellectual. The "love story", such as it was, was nothing but a story of a woman's complete submission to a man. There was zero accommodation of the man to the woman. It was 100% the other way around. I couldn't take either the ideas or the love story seriously. I'll give it two stars for its beautiful depiction of the west and for its competent writing. But I think that even that may be generous.
