REVIEW OF THE

MACARTHUR NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARY ACTS 1 12 MACARTHUR NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARY SERIES

- This was a good book with a lot of valuable information but was missing the one thing I was looking for...how to buy a new home when it's contingent on your existing home selling. I've visited many new home communities that didn't want to give me the time of day when they found out I had to sell my existing house in order to purchase a new home. I had hoped the authors would have discussed the options available for the many people in my situation.

- There's something almost pathological about the style and plotting of Joseph Conrad's An Outcast of the Islands. Reading it, one has the sense not of an artist explicating an idea, but of a man picking obsessively at a festering wound. "His story is not so much told as seen intermittently through a haze of sentences," H.G. Wells wrote of the book upon its release, and it's a fair judgment. The atmosphere of Outcast isn't merely built; it seeps from its author as if he were an emanating god in some theosophical or Qabbalistic cosmogony. In Conrad's universe, nature itself seems complicit in the downfall of men, and the weight of it is almost stifling at times for a reader. Writing in 1896, Wells also regarded Outcast as "the finest piece of fiction published this year." That judgment is more problematic. Outcast was Conrad's second novel and would also be the second in his Malay trilogy. Typical of Conrad and his uniqueness as an author, Outcast moves backwards rather than forwards in time from the story of his first book, Almayer's Folly, and shifts the primary perspective away from Almayer, a trader in a remote Malayan outpost, to his boss Lingard and the outcast of the title, a clerk named Willems. While evidence can be found throughout the book of Conrad's facility as a stylist--its opening sentences alone signal that Conrad is an author to be reckoned with--it also suffers from limited characterization and what one critic, Tim Middleton (Joseph Conrad: Routledge Guides to Literature), has rightly called an "overwrought" and "hackneyed" plot. "The doomed man" is a character that Conrad writes as well as probably anyone in literature, but the shaft that must be mined in order to reach that level of insight is too deep and dark to allow for much light to be cast on the nature of other characters. To criticize Conrad for two-dimensional characterization of women or indigenes is banal at this point, but nonetheless necessary; it limits Outcast's effectiveness and adds to the impression that, at its worst, the book is essentially nihilistic melodrama, if there could be such a thing. As Ross Slotten writes in The Heretic in Darwin's Court: The Life of Alfred Russel Wallace, "Conrad himself had traveled through the East Indies between 1881 and 1889 but did not learn Malay and was unable to firmly grasp the Malay or Papuan character." That human and linguistic shortcoming stands in stark contrast to the anthropological interest displayed by Wallace, whose The Malay Archipelago influenced Conrad and was regarded by him as a "favorite bedside companion."One final crowded type, so if
