REVIEW OF BUSINESS STRATEGY GAME CHAPTER QUIZ ANSWERS VIDANI

- If you liked "Guns, Germs and Steel" then you will probably like this book too. It is a lot easier to put down, but I had to finish it like a dose of medicine that tasted bad so it must be good for me. Actually, that sounds a little harsh and I really do recommend it. It seems less inspired that "Guns" and a like a bit of exploitation of that former great success. Maybe I am a little depressed because this is the third book I have read recently that presents a rather bleak view of the future. It is definitely a worthwhile read.

- This book is weird. Its main message is that the harvesting of timber is the greatest threat to the civilization and there may be similar serious environmental threats that decide about the fate of the societies. This thesis itself contradicts our very basic knowledge about the origins of the civilization. Ten thousand years ago or so, people began to replace the forests by fields and the first primitive forms of agriculture started. This development was completely necessary for our modern civilization to emerge. It was necessary for the appearance of intelligent life on Earth. Diamond does not appreciate this fact, and he even does not seem to realize that timber is a renewable resource. You would expect that a book about the "societies that choose to fail or succeed" will focus on the great superpowers and civilizations that were the key players in the global history. You would expect that the book will cover the history of the civilizations of the ancient Iraq, the history of China under various dynasties, the Roman Empire, the Soviet Union, and others. But of course, the fate of the important civilizations does not confirm Diamond's assumptions. For example, the Soviet Union collapsed because its socialist economy was not strong enough to compete with the West in arm races. These are obviously not good arguments for Diamond's strange statements that identify the industry and the population growth as the primary sources of evil, while the climate change and environmental damage are the most important factors that should decide about our lives. So which societies Diamond chooses to support his hardly defensible claims? An old community in Montana; Greenland; the culture on Easter Island; the Maya; the Anasazi. I have not heard about some of them, so I can't verify whether Diamond's presentation is fair. It's clear that the comparison of those civilizations with the present is ludicrous - but I think that his cherry-picking of the examples makes his conclusions unusable even in the case of the ancient societies. At any rate, his viewpoint is extremely one-dimensional - more one-dimensional than the viewpoint of Marx who believed that the fate of the societies only depends on the class struggle. The "environmental irresponsibility" is certainly not a unique factor that decides about the fate of the societies; more important ones are the military power to face other civilizations; the economic power - which is also needed to deal with the cruelties of Nature; stable enough moral standards that don't evaporate. I give Diamond 2 stars because he's sometimes able to write interesting books - and because he's famous and able to sell this bad book a lot. But otherwise, Diamond does not understand science, history, and the modern era. You know, I was brought up in communist Czechoslovakia and those communists were telling us many strange things. But I don't remember that either of them was as narrow-minded and biased against the prosperous West as Diamond is. Neither of them was questioning that the Western system was a viable one and a tough one to compete with. Neither of them was questioning that the economy had to be strong if the society should survive, and the environmental issue was just one of many factors that should influence our decisions.
