REVIEW OF LA MARAVILLOSA GRANJA DE MCBROOM

- I thought the book was o.k. but it didn't really make any sense. The characters were all strange and they had no real part of the book except to revolve around Lennie and George. But I think people should read it to find out about how things were in that time.

- The book "Of Mice and Men" is one dealing with many themes and elements of the story. The action of the novel takes place on or near a ranch in the Salinas Valley of California, south of San Francisco. The time period is never stated, but it is probably during the early 1930s, the time of the Depression. The nomadic wandering, poverty, and despair that George and Lennie embody are all indicative of that time. The dominant mood of the story is that of expectation which is developed through the dreams of the major characters. There are also other moods evoked through the actions of the characters reflecting sorrow, pity, and brutality. The novel ends on a tragic note. The tone at the end is definitely one of depression and frustration. Loneliness is a key element in this story. Many of the characters admit to suffering from profound loneliness. George sets the tone for these confessions early in the novel when he reminds Lennie that the life of a ranch-hand is among the loneliest of lives deep. The fact that they admit to complete strangers their fear of being cast off shows their desperation. In a world without friends to confide in, strangers will have to do. Each of these characters searches for a friend, someone to help them measure the world, as Crooks says. In the end, however, companionship of his kind seems unreachable. For George, the hope of such camaraderie dies with Lennie, and true to his original inference, he will go through life alone. The characters are made helpless by their isolation, and yet, even at their weakest, they seek to ruin those who are even weaker. The novel suggests that the most visible kind of strength, that used to oppress others, is itself born of weakness. The title of the novel, Of Mice and Men, is a reference to Robert Burns' poem entitled "To a Mouse". This book is a classic work of literature and one I would recommend to all.
