REVIEW OF TAKEN BY

TUESDAY THE WEEKDAY BRIDES 5 CATHERINE BYBEE

- Stephen King, the brilliant author of so many wonderful stories has so disappointed me with this book. Curiosity of how he will end the story kept me going, but the horrible toilet references and boring military ego chapters made me cheer when I gratefully reached the end!

- He did it again, or should I say "Duddits" again. That book was awesome-- especially toward the end. In the end part, he wrangles with many philosophical concepts, and portrays the self-doubts that sometimes are the only source of weakness. He was spot-on about the nature of evil and its power over you. Evil has no power over truth, because evil is lesser than truth. Fear, the fist of the devil, only has an impact if you do not have an ocean of truth to draw on for strength. Lies get their power only where we have failed to move toward and find greater truths--half-truths are the worst lies because they feel right, and get access to your heart (I have said this long before ever reading Stephens FINE book). The great truths Stephen touches on in his books give them a timeless aspect that has a lot to do with their impact. If you have greater truth in your heart, only then can you be truly free-- the evil that comes to enslave you with half-truths evaporates like a disintegrating vampire burning away in the quiet, powerful light of day. The sun leaves at night, but what we learn by day gives us fire and electricity in the darkest night. We must see that there is a greater truth we can learn which makes the sun within us, that center of meaning built by truth, as our eternal sun. There is the light that never goes out, and the sun itself pales in comparison like a picture pales in comparison to the real thing. The universe is a learning machine for us to come into being. It is mother and school. Those who are not motivated to learn its secrets--the secrets of time space and matter and all of its symbolic meaning, will not be. When a half truth is cherished, evil finds a pumping heart to spread its destruction like cancer. When a man soars to that place in the universe of truth, the well of meaning and source of being, nothing is barred to him. He is a child of the universe, and the vast, complex universe is not an overwhelming thing. The universe was made for him, and is a part of his own dreams. The universe has that haunting familiarity of dreams which is beyond the specific things we see. Even the math and sciences of it, the history of it. The universe is coherent, and we discover that coherence in our language, history, art, math, astronomy, philosophy, and science. Evil is always a lesser thing. Evil and fear are the shell of our own egg which we make to test ourselves. I sometimes think we are born alone and want to feel what it is like to have fear, to grow, to face adversity. Challenges are opportunities for learning and growth. My fears, I have found, no matter how large or complex, never seem to stick. They come in, and I see that their only power was stolen from a higher place, a higher truth. God must have given me a special life and place to do this, maybe some mutation, I don't know. You and I are of the same universe, and this path is the one path of all life--toward truth. Stephen Kings books to me are great symbolic allegories--interwoven with all the battles and demons life itself faces in the struggle towards being born into truth out of the darkness--my old friend(from the book). Truth is the life force, darkness the labyrinth, the parts of truth found in the labyrinth light the way like the stars at night to a ships captain. Truth is a dangerous game, a real labyrinth like the one in that Marines commercial with the fire and traps and monsters. If you stop you die just as if you never even tried. To me, labyrinths seem all-or-nothing affairs. To have a chance, you need to learn and move. Imagination is more important than knowledge, because only there will you find the infinite possibility, the things that spring into being because they are needed or beautiful (same thing really). There is where you forge the great living mobile thing that becomes truth in its highest form. That becomes real, becomes reality. Here's a free poem I just wrote: The symbols around me dance and sway, the engine of truth has come to play. The mountains tell stories for those that would hear, the eyes see the sounds that God painted here. I have sympathy for the devil that uncomplete thing, but I do not answer when it gives me a ring. My carpet is magic and woven from steel, there are no threads to pull to make it unreal. Darkness is not something I ever would see, I carry a sea of light, my soul, me. But that is just words, don't get locked into the threads. The poetry of reality is where we really live and words can never truly see or capture the essence of that beautiful crystalline maelstrom of spacetime that has become our cathedral, our home... Symbols are not, and do not work exactly like, reality. They are our stairway to heaven, and their construction the acts of God. Meaning always comes from us. Words do not know anything. They are an echo of the unity that made them. Our hands do not know, but they do what we know. God is writing the poem of reality. Stephen King helps us all to see that. THAT is the purpose of life, and God certainly loves the flattery Stephen gives him in his works. The admiration of a father for his son, I'm sure. If you love something, you cannot hide that. It comes through. God called, and Stephen always picks up the phone... even when he is in great pain. Pain is truly nothing--the winds blowing through an old mansion whose windows long since broke. Echoes from our past of vestigial limbs and the cycles of the body. Like any symbol, bodily pain is information-- powerfully compelling information. But compared to reality as it truly is, it is part of the hum of the city and nothing more. Spiritual pain is the only real pain, and it is caused by lies, doubts, guilts, and fears. Stephen King helps to lift us from this old house of pain back into the future of light, truth, and glory. A dream catcher is a great symbol, a divine symbol even. I always liked those. Those who do not grow will die, because growth is moving toward God, toward greater personal and universal insight. You reach a point eventually where this all begins to gain a momentum of its own and comes regardless of obstacles. You become an engine of truth yourself. um, yes, I like his books. Especially this one.
