REVIEW OF REBECCA BROWN BECOMING A VESSEL OF HONOUR

- "World Building" is the term for modern fantasy and sci fi writers who take great lengths to create fictional cultures and civilizations, and then immerse their readers in them. They all learned it from such efforts as Edgar Rice Burroughs "Mars" series. As you read this book, you'll actually sort of wonder why the Mars Rovers didn't come across the peoples and civilizations described, and you'll feel a bit sad that they did not. Burroughs describes two societies, one somewhat different than our own, and one completely different. He includes animals, races, social customs, and physiology that were far ahead of his time in terms of literary imagination. Of course, his books were written, self admittedly, as pulp. There are flaws in plotting and some cliché in character development, but these are quickly washed away by the compelling story and the struggles of the hero to survive, and to help those natives of Mars for whom he has come to care. If you somehow missed these books before, they are good reads, for either older children or adults with a taste for the fanciful. The first few of the series have fallen into the public domain, and you can obtain them for free either here on Amazon for your Kindle, or from places like Project Gutenberg as text files. The first three books comprise a trilogy: A Princess of Mars, The Gods of Mars, and Warlord of Mars. All three are public domain. Read, enjoy, and be carried away into a world you'll bemoan the loss of when you are done with the books!

- This was an interesting book that had a little of history and soap opera in it. It had a great background of the how people were treated when the 13 colonies were started. It took place in the Puritan town of Wethersfield, Connecticut. This book will keep you on the edge of your seat wanting to know what will happen next. It was exciting yet subtle at times. Elizabeth George Speare amazingly brought out a love story through politics and witchcraft.
