REVIEW OF EXAMPLES OF JOURNALISTIC AND LITERARY WRITING

• As the novel opens it is December 31st and a young doctor, Andy Zorn, is on his way to a meeting, a job interview. A raging snow storm is making his trip more like an arctic wilderness trek than a usually pleasant stroll along Michigan Avenue in Chicago. Dr. Zorn is anxious to get the job, to leave behind his former life and career, to move on to anywhere or anything other than Chicago. Zorn gets the job, that of director, but not medical director, of a retirement community in Tampa, Florida. Within hours the doctor is on the road south. The various stories of the residents of the retirement home, The Palms, comprise the remainder of the novel. We learn about the various residents of The Palms, how they came to live there, and what transpires for them there during the next year. This is reminiscent in some ways to classic Michener style in that it has a huge cast of characters that the reader follows over an extended period. Stories that start out isolated eventually become entwined with others often after being seemingly forgotten. In other ways though this is a departure from Michener's usual style, instead of being transported to an exotic locale we are taken to Florida. Instead of the vast timeline Michener is noted for, spanning many decades and generations, RECESSIONAL takes place in the course of one calendar year. This is darker overall than much of Michener works, although it is not without the usual Michener theme of the triumph of the human spirit despite adverse circumstances. Also Michener's various agendas are more prevalent in this one than in his usual style. Still, fans of Michener will enjoy this one even though it is not quite the sweeping epic that he is known for.

• I was really disappointed in this book. I had heard such rave reviews but it definitely was a book I struggled through and only finished since I bought it new and kept thinking I would find something redeeming in it.
