REVIEW OF PRINCIPLES OF ECONOMICS 6TH EDITION MANKIW SOLUTION

- The Stranger, by Albert Camus, is a good book that was originally written in French. Any book that is translated into English is almost always a good book. In this book you read about a man named Meursault that is almost indifferent on every subject in the story, and you really start to notice it as you read further into the story. As you read The Stranger it seems as if Meursault isn't even participating in the world around him, it seems like he's just watching. Through the book I noticed that Albert Camus gets into a lot of detail in The Stranger. Albert Camus describes every action that Meursault goes through. An example of this is when Meursault says I smoked a cigar in my mother's living room. Again, this statement is one of indifference. Infact, many of the statements in this book are like this one. Very few statements in this book are either positive or negative. I believe Albert Camus does this for a reason. I think he does it so you can find out how you think. This book was written in 1946 and is considered Albert Camus' one masterpiece. Even in today's world it still holds social significance. It gives the reader an insight on how he or she thinks through the neutral character Meursault. Nearly sixty years later Albert Camus' masterpiece is still read by people every day. It is even part of the high school reading criteria. Even if your not that entranced with The Stranger it will still make you think. Even if the thoughts aren't positive. There are parts in this story when you think, 'Why would he say that.' Or, 'Now why would he get involved with him.' Like any books though I think there are some flaws. Sometimes he does things that seem to have no meaning except to further the plot. In fact, the plot itself doesn't seem to show itself until halfway through the story. In the end though this is still a book you should consider reading. It is an interesting book and after reading it for a while you will start getting into the plot.

- Essentially this book is about a man whose alleged crime is merely the excuse used to remove him from society. During the trial of the central character we are told he is guilty of neglect, lacks empathy, and is in a sense socially maladjusted. For this he is executed. Today all we need to do to witness such an injustice is turn on the news to see so many of our fallen members of society judged on their social habits and personal shortcomings in the name of justice and the greater good.
