REVIEW OF LITERATURE IN ENGLISH PAPER 3 WAEC QUESTION AND ANSWER

- I was given this book as a young teenager by my father when I was interested in the Bermuda Triangle. I am very lucky he did. The book carefully goes through dozens of "cases" of missing craft and convincingly shows them to be either the victims of storms, mechanical failure and in several instances, simply made up. By far the profoundest impact of this book was the exposition of the lies and mendacity of the writers of such books - a young person needs to hear and be shown in a non-condescending way that just because something appears on TV or in book form doesn't mean its true. Larry Kusche's book started me on the road to critical thinking, to ask "What does this mean?" to any given statement. I went on to read a book or two more debunking UFOs and other pseudoscience, but Kusche's book did the main trick by getting across to me the importance of checking sources, asking if other motives are involved (like making money out of decent but unsuspecting people). I also recommend the *VHS tape of Nova's show, The Bermuda Triangle,* which is a debunking tape and promoter of critical thinking. I also recommend Carl Sagan's book *The Demon-Haunted World* which goes into incredible detail (in a non-condescending way) about why some people need to believe in such things as alien-abduction (or in an earlier era, demonic possession), false memories, the techniques of frauds like Uri Geller, and considers how we can encourage critical thinking in our society.

- I read this book years ago and remember thinking at the time that I wished there were more book like this written on other topics. The book is simple, straightforward, and written in such a way that if you have access to a good library with good research facilities you can retrace many of the authors research steps yourself. I was in graduate school at the time and would take breaks in the library from my real course work to look up some of his claims in the book, and I didn't find even one that was remotely incorrect. Since then that's an approach I take when trying to decide which side of an issue I'm going to agree with when I don't have the time or inclination to do a lot of research on my own. What I do is take a random sample of the claims being made by both sides of an issue, then first I decide if any of the claims by either side don't make much logical sense. If one side or another makes a lot of claims that don't make logical sense and the other side doesn't, then I don't really go any farther in my own research. Why should I waste my time researching somebody's point of view if they can't even construct logical arguments? Then I look up the easy to verify factual claims. If one side makes a lot of factual claims that turn out to be incorrect and the other side doesn't once again I don't go any farther. Why should I waste my time with what somebody has to say when they can't even get their simple fact straight? If somebody comes up with a new book about the Bermuda Triangle that gets rid of ALL the nonsense that Kusche's book exposes, but I'm not wasting my time on any book that has the usual nonsense in it.
