REVIEW OF N2 QUESTION PAPERS AND MEMORANDUM

- A good read for a day at the beach. Not too much in this story that needs deep thinking, sort of popcorn for the brain.
- It appears that Creationism has evolved significantly over the years and is converging to closely match modern evolution theory. In his book Refuting Evolution author Jonathan Sarfati Ph. D. easily accepts formerly proscribed facts: Beneficial Mutation, Natural Selection, and Speciation. He might be writing the next high school textbook on evolution theory except for one critical departure from the norm. The main difference between Sarfati's theory and that of Darwin's successors is that Sarfati does not believe a mechanism exists in which new information can be added to a genome without loss of previous information. He does believe that new information can be added to the information space by replacing information that already exists although only at the loss of the previous information. Sarfati claims that organisms can differentiate, yea even unto speciation, but only within their information space or genome. Sarfati bases this claim on the fact no mechanism exists that allows for simple organisms to increase their information space. As a result evolution to more complex forms is impossible. Of course, the reverse is also true. If such a mechanism does exist, Sarfati's theory would be wrong (at least until he absorbed more evolution theory into his own). Hypothetically speaking, one way that information could be added without loss of information might be the duplication of genetic information. This way the information space could be increased without harm to the organism since the new space still carries the old information. Subsequent mutation of the duplicate produces new information without loss of the old. If genetic duplication were true it would be conceivable that simple organisms could become increasingly complex. In fact, genetic duplication does occur, and has been observed both in nature and in the laboratory. A brief perusal of the currently available literature on the subject produces two known mechanisms for genetic duplication. In the case of transposons, the child carries a second copy of a parent gene or section of chromosome. In polyploidy, fairly common in plants, some or all chromosomes in a parent are duplicated often resulting in very large genomes. In both cases the result is that the child has a genome with redundant information but with increased information space. The two copies can diverge through mutation resulting in a child genome with both new information and greater complexity. The fact that information of genetic duplication is and has been readily available since prior to the publication of Mr. Sarfati's book breeds one of two possibilities. Either author Sarfati's research on his chosen subject is deficient due to gross neglect or, for reasons known only to him, Sarfati is withholding facts and intentionally misleading his readership. Perhaps Mr. Sarfati, and beyond doubt his readership, would benefit if he should spend more time at the library and less at the typewriter.
