REVIEW OF BERNARD WERBER ENGLISH PDF

- Butler gives a concise distillation of critical information about the Hebrew of the text, allows the text itself to have the front seat, and brings the best of recent scholarship to bear. It is a must have volume to preach from or dig deeply into Joshua.
- Patricia Wentworth mysteries are books which I love to read multiple times. I first read this particular title several years ago and found that I did not specifically remember who the culprit was. Happy days for me again! Paulina Paine lost her hearing as a result of a bomb blast during the war and has learned to make the best of a bad situation. She has developed her ability to lip-read to a fine art. Often she would find herself privy to conversations which she did not want to overhear. Such was the case when she noticed the two men talking when she visited the art gallery to see the works of two young men included in the current exhibition. David Moray had painted, and sold, a picture of Paulina and even she had to admit that it was a really good depiction of her. Such good things could not be said for the art of Wilfrid Gaunt, her cousin Hilda's son. While taking a break from walking around the gallery Paulina lip-read the remarks of one of the two men who seemed to have met by accident. Only one part of the conversation was shown to her but it was enough to send her trembling from the gallery to the comfort of a good cup of tea. Paulina had seen the plans for a robbery being made and they included the murder of the person being robbed. No location, person or specific item was described. Paulina knew that the police would never believe her, there was just not enough information to give them. She did, however, know about Miss Maude Silver and she immediately made arrangements to meet with Miss Silver and tell her all about the crime which was to take place. As is often the case, once Paulina had told her story to Miss Silver, she felt so relieved that she declined to go to the police and even refused to take a taxi home. On her way home, she fell under a bus and was killed. Something which I am always fascinated by in a Patricia Wentworth mystery is to see how she will bring all her characters together in one place so that they are all involved in the mystery. This time, these people are all brought together by the fact that Lucius Bellingdon bought the picture of Paulina Paine painted by David Moray. A gathering of people is assembled at Merefields, the country house of Lucius Bellingdon and we have a chance to meet and get to know each of these characters as Miss Silver quietly sits and listens to anything anyone says, no matter how trivial it may seem. I enjoyed this story, although it is not my favorite Miss Silver story. This one seems to have quite a bit of repetitious material in it. That in itself is not unusual, Miss Silver has to relate everything she finds out to the police and to her employer. But in this book she also seems to tell it all to quite a few other people. Wentworth has given us some very strong "good" characters and some equally strong "bad" characters. There is the looked for (and thoroughly enjoyed) romance between two "bright young things". It all follows the Wentworth pattern very well. I usually like to see quite a bit more of the Scotland Yard end of the story but this one is pretty much solved by Miss Silver and her deductive powers. One other reviewer says that this would be a good place for the novice reader of Patricia Wentworth to start. I'm afraid I don't agree. This one might be a little less interesting to someone who doesn't know the Wentworth style and how she will tie all the loose ends together into that very neat package I require. Try THE CHINESE SHAWL, THE CATHERINE WHEEL, MISS SILVER COMES TO STAY, THE CASE OF WILLIAM SMITH, SHE CAME BACK or THE IVORY DAGGER. All are capital stories. But then, for me, any Patricia Wentworth/Maude Silver story is capital!
