REVIEW OF PROJECT MANAGEMENT 5TH EDITION GRAY LARSON

- The Giver is novel about a community and a society optimized through governance by a strong central committee of elders, which are only briefly encountered in the book. The book focuses on one boy's transition from youth to early adulthood, Jonas. Through his eyes, we come to know his family and community. Everything is very structured and orderly. People's careers and mates are assigned to them based on observance and psychological profiling for optimal fit. Even reproduction is assigned to specific people who engage in sex for reproductive purposes. Children are then raised by natures. People chosen to rear children until they are two years of age, at which point, the children are assigned to families for further upbringing. Once children reach the age of 12, they are assigned their careers and begin training. The old are well cared for in retirement communities where care givers see to their needs. The high degree of structure is even found in people's daily lives where we find everyone eats, sleeps, plays and works based on the schedules dictated by the governing body. Families even have designated sharing time. Where each family member is supposed to share their feelings based on their experiences during the day. At first, there is something seductive about this society. People are well treated; there is no war, poverty or crime. However, as we see the community through the Jonas' eyes, one cannot help but notice unsettling aspects to the community. Jonas' mother's comments that no woman should want to be a breeder as these women are assigned to physical labor after three years of producing children. The elderly are "released" when they reach a certain point in their lives as are small children whose behavior is too unruly. The people seem to need the orderliness and any disruption in their serene existence results in almost child-like responses expecting someone to take care of them. Jonas is selected to be the new "keeper of memories" a prestigious position awarded only when the old keeper is nearing retirement. His first instructions are to discontinue sharing and he is given permission to lie. This is the beginning of his introduction into the world behind the community's pristine facade. He learns of love and his parents' inability to express it as the concept lacks the precision the community expects in language. Love is too messy to be truly meaningful in the community. His journey of discovery ultimately leads to death or salvation depending upon the reader's hopes. In my opinion it leads to death as Jonas' last moments in the book are too conveniently similar to the collected memories given to him. Also, ending in death leads to a bitter poignancy. The realization that his society has made him into someone that cannot hope to survive outside its rigid confines. His new memories are the only thing left from lives lived before sameness. Lowry's book is a brief, well-written book on the dangers inherent in wanting too much safety, ease and convenience. The result is a society with no pain, grief, longing or suffering. However, there is no love, passion, joy or deep appreciation. Life is functional, but not meaningful. The world has become gray, not because the people are color blind, but because they are numb from a society that protects them from being human. This book is an excellent cautionary tale for our own society. We have become a society afraid of any form of discomfort, and seek to isolate ourselves from it. In the pursuit of isolation we have separated ourselves from our extended families. We text instead of greet. We email instead of talk. We have successfully insulated ourselves from each other, making for a safe, rarified environment bereft of the messiness that comes with real living. Lowry shows us the final result of the decision to make efficiency and safety paramount and impossibility of breaking out of these chains once they are forged.

- This book The Giver by Lois Lowry, I personally think that it is a great and fascinating book. If I had to rate this book I guess I would rate 5 stars, because the author is very descriptive. So if she said something like how the muffin made Jonas's mouth water everytime he felt the warmth of the muffin bounce of his hip as he walked. You could see a muffin bouncing of his hip as he walks. Other reasons I would give this book a five is because she leaves you hanging and in suspense, it also makes you wonder what happened to the person or how he/she got there or got out safely. Plus another reason is the vocabulary is like words you never knew existed. The book makes you feel like you are really in Jonas's utopia. I think that everyone should read this book but mostly people that like cliff hangers and suspense.
