REVIEW OF LJUBAVNI ROMANI ISSUU

- In Guns, Germs, and Steel, Diamond as Yalu poses the question, "why do some societies succeed better than others." The rest of the book is a compelling attempt to answer that question. In the followup, "Collapse" Diamond asks the question why do some fail. To the extent that he stays on that topic, the book succeeds. Like GG&S, it's popularized research. Not up to the level of something you would find in a purely academic publication, and some of his assumptions don't match the latest research, but as with GG&S; Diamonds critics overstate the importance of those mistakes to his thesis. When he is talking about easter island, the pueblo peoples, and greenland, this is a good (not great) book. Unfortunately the other two thirds of the book are a preachy sophomoric mess. Trying to talk about the sustainability of modern industrialized society without really mentioning energy and oil production, and giving only the most trivial (and demonstrably wrong) discussion about the role of technology is talking about the cockroaches while the 800 pound gorillas play pinochle. Also, by focusing on the problems and insisting on some platonic ideal of sustainability, his assumptions about the problems actually argue for solutions that he is very unlikely to favor. By insisting that the game is zero sum, Diamond actually legitimizes the short term selfish behavior that one assumes he is trying to fight.

- Jared Diamond provides some interesting thoughts, and provides the background to support his ideas and concepts. Allows the reader to think through the individual issues - what set up the fall, what was happening in the environment (human, political, etc.), and did they see it coming. Thought provoking - a good read. Wish all the political candidates would read this - it might change some of their thought processes.
