REVIEW OF INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINE BY GANESAN

- This book is well written. I love the details of the history of Seven Oaks. It does include some pictures which help to illustrate of a time and place long lost.
- This was the earliest, I believe, of the first-person accounts of Alzheimer's: a book triggered by a series of interviews with DeBaggio on National Public Radio, interviews which alerted millions of people to the anguish of early-onset Alzheimer's. The subject is inherently gripping: how does someone whose mind is dissolving--whose hippocampus is turning into gorgonzola, as one sympathetic reviewer describes his own condition--gather his wits enough to write a coherent book? Primarily, in DeBaggio's case, by relying on his mostly-intact memory of his youth and middle years, before dementia set in. (Also, to lesser effect, by inserting numerous long quotations from a Progress Report on Alzheimer's from the National Institute on Aging.) DeBaggio has grown forgetful, as of the writing of this book, but is still much in control of his faculties. He can write, and write clearly, and wants to tell his story before he dies. His diagnosis, he explains, grabbed him by the throat: he'd been given a death sentence. But "A few days later I realized good might come of this.

After forty years of pussyfooting with words, I finally had a story of hell to tell." And stories of hell make for compelling books. Not all DeBaggio's reminiscences light up the page, and the long academic quotations sometimes break up the flow. But I perk up at this candid admission: "I have enjoyed my life but I have a nagging feeling I have not had much fun. I never slept around and got drunk; instead I read and got politicized." He looks back on his youth and sees that "struggle and hard work sapped love of life. There is no gaiety in me now, if there ever was. I am as boring as the flat cornfields of Iowa that surround the little town of Eldora where I was born." When he writes like that, in the most personal way, he's not boring at all, but alive and tender, a man with a hell of a story.
